Marcus Antonius was with his fleet overcome at Actium, and hereupon fled to Alexandria; where being by Caesar besieged, and in bitter despair of recovering his former state but moved especially upon a false rumour that was spread, how Cleopatra was killed, he slew himself. When Caesar was now Master of Alexandria, Cleopatra like wise because she would not fall into the hands of the conqueror, willingly procured her own death. Caesar upon his return to the city of Rome, had the honour of three triumphs in one over Illyricum, another for the victory at Actium, and the third in regard of Cleopatra. That when he had subdued all Europe which had continued 21 years, M. Lepidus, the son of Lepidus, the Triumvir, confounded against Caesar; and while he went about to make war, was prevailed and slain.

Of the CXXXIV, Book.

Cains Caesar having set the state in good order, and reduced all Provinces into one certain form, was crowned also Augustus; and the month Sextilis to honour his name was likewise so called. While the sat navitation in Narbone, he took a review of the three Provinces of Gaul, which his father (Caes) had conquered. The war which M. Caesar made against the Biscarrians, Moorsians, and other nations, be here reported.

Of the CXXXV, Book.

Tertius, Caesar, fed against the Thracians, as also which Caesar made upon the Spaniards is here set down. Likewise how the Saltians, a people inhabiting the Alps, were utterly subdued.

Of the CXXXVI, Book.

Rhetia was conquered by Tiberius Nero, and Drusus his son's son, Agrippa Caesar's son in law did: and by Drusus was the general review and taken.

Of the CXXXVII, Book.

The Cities of Germany, as one on either side the Rhine, are by Drusus besieged and assaulted. The provinces in France, by reason of the fore said review or tax, was appeased. Another was restored into Drusus Caesar at the confines of the two rivers, Arar and Rhodanus; and a Priest was created to offer thereupon, one C. Julius Verconradius in Hedum.
Of the CXXXVIII, Book.

Here is shewed how the Thracians were by L. Plautus named. Likewise how the Thebæi, Teumace, the Cæcini, and other nations of Germany beyond the Rhine, were subdued and brought under by Drusus, Octavia the sister of Augustus departed this life, having buried before her son Marcellus: whose monuments still remain, namely, the Theatre and gallery bearing his name as if they had been dedicated by Marcellus.

Of the CXXXIX, Book.

This war which Drusus managed against the nations beyond Rhine is here reported. In which war the chief persons that fought were Senequius and Ancus, Tribunes of the Roman State. Nero the brother of Drusus subdued the Dalmations and Thracians. Peace was concluded with the Parthians: and upon capitulation the military ensigns were delivered up again to their King, which first under the conduct of Cælius, and afterwards of Antonius were lost, and by them taken.

Of the CXL, Book.

In this book is related the war which Drusus fought against the Cities and States of Germany beyond the Rhine. Himself fell from his horse and broke his leg, by reason that his horse fell therefore upon which fracture he died thirty days after. His corpse was by his brother Nero (who being bent for upon the news of his sicknefs, rode in past) brought through to Rome, and deftroyed in the tomb of C. Julius. Praised he was by Cæsar Augustus his father in law, and at his funeral for a fault far well he was emitted with many honourable names.

To the Reader.

The history of Titus Livius, as it was by him passing well penned otherwise, and none thereto in Latine comparable: so in the calculation and date of times, which they call Chronology (a singular light cogive direction in a story) he is somewhat defective and unlike himself; so as he cannot be praised without exception. But if we consider the huge volumes which he wrote and named, in his declining age; the variety and disagreement of former authors whom he followed, who before him faulted allio in this point, and whereas he much complaineth; he is to be pitied and pardoned if his memory failed somewhat in this behalf. For where shall we find a man that is squire to every subject? And indeed if we weigh the thing aught, as it was a profession by it self, and required a whole man, to many travelled therein alone, and they that performed well but it only, deferved high thanks and commendation. And to let many others pass, how worthy is T. Pomponius Atticus praised by Cicero his friend, for digetting the head Magistrates of 700 years in one book? As on Verrius L. Lucius, who lived in the time of Augustus Cæsar, he collected a catalogue and register of the chief Rulers of Rome, how they were chosen successively, and how they governed from time to time: which as he could be cut and engraven in a marble wall within the Capitol for a perpetual memory to posterity: so thereby he delivered all to have his own name erected near the Temple of Vesta, for an everlasting memorial of so great a benefic, But what is there so durable that time waffeth not? What so conspicuous and evident, but trouble some dates may overwhelm and hide in oblivion? Thus amidst that havoc which the Goths and Vandals made in Latine, there remained in those fourteenth part extant of Livy’s history; thus in that general confusion of Rome, these records of Verrius Flaccus were defaced, broken, and buried deep under the ruins of the Capitol and other lately edifices. But the revolution of times as it hath brought to light again some pieces of Livy; it has also discovered all those marbles of Verrius; for in the time of Papi the third, pope of Rome, the fragments of the said stones were digged out of the ground between the Roman Forum and the broad street Via Sacra: brought forth also & laid abroad in the Capitol to the view of the world. To which, as the true touchstone certain learned men of late dates have laid to their own labours in that kind, namely, Bartholomew Mariani of Militia, Onuphrius Parvus of Verona, Charles Sigonius of Modena and Francis Robertus of Udine: and comparing the fame as also the annals gathered by Henry Glareanus before time, with the forelaid antiquities of Verrius late found, have recovered much light to the history of Livy, and have led his wants in that behalf. I thought it not amiss therefore to gratifie my countrymen in some measure this way also, and deliver the same in English which I found annexed to the best editions in Latine as followeth.
A CHRONOLOGIE TO THE HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS,
Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaccus in the Capitoll, and set out with most profitable Notes, shewing the variety and disagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Consuls.

The causes of different and repugnance in Historiographers, as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the City of Rome.

In one intend to set forth a Kalender or Register of the Consuls mentioned in the History of Livius, which by reason of uncertainty, obscurity, and discordance of the times, is too dark and intricate, that not only the learned but also experienced historians of our age, but the best writers of the Roman story in ancient times, have oftentimes complained thereof; we think it not pertinent to our purpose, briefly to search into the causes of this difficulty: which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which leemeth to accord best with the Historiographical, and to be grounded upon the authority and testimony of the most authentic and approved writers. For seeing that an History (as Cicero hath most truly said) is the witness of times; what is more unsatisfying to this than to mislead and want that which is the chief point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was first and what was last done? It leemeth therefore, that of this diversity in the account and computation of the Roman Consuls, there be three principal causes.

The first is, for that the year in which the first Consuls entered into that Magnificacy, is by the Roman Historiographers not sure; one for but diversly set down. For Dionysius (a most diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his first book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth, reports that the KK. reigned 244 years: which also is collected out of the yearly computation gathered by Farro and approved by the authority of others. For Messala reporteth, how upon the expulsion of the KK., which hapned in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Consuls. To which opinion Livy also subscribeth in the end of his first book, saying, that the regiment of KK. continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Euporius in his first book writeth that the seven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years: which account agreeeth with Sex. Rufius in his abridgment. In which variety this is to be observed, that these two first named, reckoning the years only of every Kings reign, and out of the whole and gross sum leave out the year of the interregnum, which Dionysius, Livius, Messala, and the rest interfet between, and that right truly and upon good reason: for after the death of Romulus, the interregnum continued one year. Consider then and examine the thing diligently, and you shall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in severall, Euporius and Sex. Rufius both, attribute as many years to the Kings government, as Denys, Livy, and the rest, so that this difference is not much. But others there be (as Ensebius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write, that the KK., reigned but 243 years, and take the interregnum withall: whole judgment, Orofius, Tornandes, and Bede seem to follow. For Orofius in the first chapter of his second book recordeth, that Brutus the Consul in that very year namely the 244. put his own sons to death. The Kings reigned not precisely so many years, but for that some (and named, Romulus) went over some months and daies, Dionysius and Livius reckoned them for a full year, and laid it to Tarmquins Prifons: but the other above-named, together with Ensebius, left out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a compleat year) and assigned but only seven and thirty years to the reign of King Prifons. To this may be added another reason of the like nature; namely, that as divers authors have doubtfully reported the year, so they arc no more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Plutarch in his Problems writeth, that they entered upon the first day of January: but Macrobius in the first book of his Saturnalia and seventeenth chapter, leemeth to imply that they took their Consuls place the first of June, saying (according to the opinion of others) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely. upon the first day thereof (according to a vow whereunto he was obliged by the benefitment of Tarquin) he folenized a sacrifice to the goddesse Carmenta upon mount Capitul, Othres
Others again write, how this hapned the 24 of February; grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of Rome, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second book of his Calender thus wrote:

King Tarquin with his sons then fled: The Consuls yearly bear
The sovereign rule at Rome: since that, no King ever reign'd there.

Some there are besides of opinion, that they entered the first day of July: and of their mind feemath Joachimn Perinianus to be, in his third book of the Greek Magistrates. In this regnimn therefor there are of opinions very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that of Plutarch, it hath long since been clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clarks. Oxyrinchos Pamiius, and Sigonius: since it is plain that it was the fix hundred year from the foundation of the City:and not before, that the Consuls began their government the first of January. But in setting down the certain day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Macrnianus lineth this way and faith, That the first day of the Consuls government was the fix and twentieth day of May. But Plutarch thinketh that the first Consuls were created the 26th day of February. And this diversity is found not only in the day when the first Consuls took their government: but also in the time after ending. What was the usual day of any month whereby the Consuls were wont to begin their Magistracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the fix hundred year from the Cities foundation. In the four and fforty year verily after the Kings were exiled the first day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly Magistrates to take their place: but have many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was change, he thought not before he came to the three hundred and two year, and then he faith in his third book. That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at least we may collect by him (when he faith that this time was solemn) that he meant not two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called solemn, which is by law usually observed. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the first book, that this time was also altered: for whereas the first day of December was the usual time that Magistrates began to execute their office, he faith, that it was changed, in these words. The principal Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the death or the incertitude of their Generals (that to shame all an overthrow was received) and advised, not to expect and lay for the ordinary time of the election but presently to create new military Tribunals in Consuls authority, who should enter into their government the first day of October &c. Wherefore this opinion of theirs imported, and the who is so much accounted to it: whereupon the other Tribunals give thus the Senat, and gave quite to resign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oaths and beginning their Magistracy. And a little after, within one page, he faitheth that the usual day of entrance into government, was altered from the eleventh of December to the first of September, sayling, When this speech was received with a general applause of all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat &c. But this day was kept but a few years. For about six years after, the Senat, by occasion that both Consuls lay sick. it was ordained that the first of July should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was changed to another, whatsoever it was, for named it is not: and therefore uncertain. But this hapned in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book, 1 heareth in these words; And when the Consuls were commanded to resign up their Magistracy before the time to the end that new Consuls might the sooner be created, against those great troubles of war &c. For in these words [The Senat &c. the declarer that the usual day of entering into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly set down what day this was: for the other was as well known: for soon after, and namely the eighth year following it was appointed, to wit, the first day of July. Immediately therefore (quoth he) the new Consuls, L. Aemilius Ma ercians and Cn. Flaminius were joynd that day even the first of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themselves their Provinces. As for the month wherein for the most part the assembly for election of Magistrates was holden, we read it was February; like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held always during the second Punick war and the Macedonian, and longer than so. Thus Livy testifieth in many places, which to quote is needless) as in the first book of the second Punick war, and in the beginning of the first book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who feeth not that there is great variety in the month and day both. Whereupon the Magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependeth upon a precise exact, firm, and settled reckoning of years months and dates; and seeing that in Livy's story it is not expressly shewed what year month or day, the Magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered; considering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconstantly delivered than the very usual day of entering into Magistracy, what marvel is there if authors differ so much about the computation of the times? whereas one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles some, I say, ascribe these Magistrates created this year, others, the same to another?

Thirdly, there being great difference between Dionysius and Livy, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that there inpass'd: all leemeth to have risen hereupon, that the purpose of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrences of greatest antiquity which hapned in the State of the people of Rome: and which by many writers after time had been been most diligently set down and penned to posterity: but to record and write those things especially, which from the time a little before the second Punic war, had been achieved by the people of Rome, unto the age wherein himself lived. But because these events, and the particular discourses therefore, left to great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should seem maimed and imperfect; in the form of a book he slightly and briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the City, unto the beginning of the second Punic war, but disdaining to particularize and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourse of affairs, informally as those things whereof Livy hath chiefly made 3 books he hath declared at large in eleven.

Hereupon if a man read in Dionysius, the ancient beginning and original of the Roman Empire, and examine how the times are hereby digested & compared the fame with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhastiness of the latter. But if the indistinct reader consider the purpose and intent of them both, he will yield unto either of them their due praise; whereas Livy making haste to other matters, hath either left part or more lightly handled some things, he will judge him worthy rather to be excused than reproved for it.

To the three caules above related, others also might be adjoin'd: namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may sufficiently toouch these & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertise and shew the reader by the ways that a belt in the digesting and reckoning of the Colli, have we let before our eyes to follow the marble tables and monuments of Verrus Flaccus, and according therto have framed and applied the computation of the years: yet that year before the 450 as also the other, whither Verrus rejected, we have inserted with the rest, that our account might fall out just with the time of the years, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Omporius Paucatus a most learned man hath done in his Calender, thinking that the year which Verrus and they that followed him raised out was the 449, and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consils, according to the Capitoline records.

The calculation of times usually observed by the Romans, and of the year of the City's foundation.

The Achaean (as we read) received it from the revolution of the stars: the Argives from their women Priests; as for example, if Cichla such a year was chief Priest to offer sacrifices, they counted the number of years from the said Cichla. But many have derived and fetched the cause from the years before Try was built, or else after the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 408 year after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympic games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grand sire by the mothers side and which he called Iphitus (or Iphes, as some have it) were renewed that year: from that time (I say) they began to number the years by the Olympians, especially among the Greeks, whole story (as Eutmus affirmed) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympiad, the Hebrews, like as other nations in the East, received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians from their Eponymi (as they called them) by that in their Areopagita (that is, the election of their Magistrates) which were wont to hold certain days about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wise, ηαμες προς ηπειρας της Αριστοκρατιας, the tenth or eleventh of the first Priapian. And hereof it seemeth, that the name comes therefrom; as it from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name.

After the example of the Athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their dates, made their Kalender, and regulated their acts by such and such Consils; nothing thereof otherwhiles the year from the Cives foundation, but about it there is much more diversity in authors, than about that wherein the first Consils took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not pertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearse the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome was founded.

To begin then at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and farther off: Timaeus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced hath recorded, how the City was built) by Romans much about the time that Carthage was stuck by the Tyrians, namely, in the 38 years before the first Olympiad.

Livy (a Senator of Rome by calling) saith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympiad. Q. Fufius Tullius (a most ancient writer of the Roman history and of great credit) attributeth it to the first year of the eight Olympiad.

Publius Maggiplianus and Dionysius Siculus quote the second year of the 7 Olympiad.

Appolodorus Q. Lutatius Calvus, Cornelius Nepos, Eratotheenes, M. Porcini, Calvus, Dionysius Halicarnassus, and Theophrastus Anthecenom, name the first year of the 7 Olympiad.

M. Verrus Placent., (the author of the Capitoline stone-records) T. Livius, C. Julius Solonius, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympiad.
L. Tarquinus Firmus, M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Caesar, C. Plinyus Secundus, Plutarchus Choronzon, Domenicus Caesar Augustus, P. Cornelius Tacitus, Caesius Dio, A. Gellius, L. Sophrinis Severus Augustus Caesarfrius, M. Julius Philippus Augustus, Ennius, P. Marcellus, C. Caesar Cestius, Aulus Oratius, M. Plinyus Longobardus; and after the time of C. Caesar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we also go by) will have the City to be founded the third year of the first Olympian.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these authors is induced, and whereby they would seem to confirm their several opinions, needletis it is in this place to deliberate: both because the speculation hereof pertained properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plutarch in Romulus, Salamin in the 1. chapter of his Polybius, and Camerius in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so throngly handled by Ouophinis Pausanias in the first book of his Calendar, that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romulus: It was the eleventh day before the Calends of May, called Parilia or Palaest. Now this was a festival day to the Eleusinian marble, in which, upon the eleven calendar days of May, in the fields and country villages, for the chaying away of wolves, for the preservation of their sheep and cattle from diaciles, or for the fair yeasting and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Propertius in his fourth book, in this wise: After there was a Palilia, our fathers did call,

Ovid also in the fourth book of his Fasti: A time full meet they choose, withough the plot to work,

Dio: Roma's Pales was laid and so began the work.

The same is avouched by M. Tullius Plutarchus, Salaminus and others. And that these Palaes were solemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Calendars, as also by the same authors before rehearsed.

Of the first sovereign Magistrates of the City of Rome, namely of the KK, who were in number seven.

As forts of politics and governments in a Common-weal which are set down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the lawall course of destiny or upon some troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: so as no Common-weal in manner there can be found, wherein they proceeded to one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK, ruled it: but when they for their excessive outrage and inordinate lust excited upon their Citizens and Subjects, were despised and expelled, the Coss, (and after them the Tribunes military in the Coss authority) held the sovereignty. But in process of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (happily the best) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Cawimus and Decius Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, until in that time as their power and authority was by Sillientin twain, and the Commons differeated of their lands and killed: then the administration of the Common-weal was restored again to the Nobles and principal perons of the City. But at length, when it was oppressed again by the civil war of Pompey and Caesar, the foreign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Caesar alone: wherein, being first shaken a few years before, through the wicked insolency and lust of the three Tribunvis, it continued until the time that it fell to utter ruin. We therefore will briefly go through all these forts of government, in that incoercent order as they followed one after another, and first begin with the KK.

Romulus, the founder of the City, reigned 37 years: for so many Lucius assigned unto him. Likewise Dionysius in the first book, which he repeate also in the second; and Plutarch in Numa delineated not from them, howsoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Salminus in like manner rehearsing his worthy acts attributeth unto his reign 37 years. Only Euripides (1. book 4. chap.) saith of him 39 years: but Cappian thinneth very well that the City is corrupt. This Prince having reigned (according to the more common received opinion of authors) 37 years: in which time he laid the first ground-work of the Roman Empire with excellent laws and ordinances, and established both civil and also military discipline, departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, Nones Capronites: by occasion that he in multicing and reviewing his army at the lake of Caprona, was conveyed out of mens sight: whereupon the people fled as amazed at the sudden death of their King, as Plutarck & Dionysius do witness. This Romulus after his deification was named Quirinus of which furnome Ovid in his Kalender giveth these reasons,
Or one year after the death of Romulus the noblest fell to variance and strife who should be king, but by reason that no one person excelled above the rest in that state to newly founded, there grew several factions & debates in their head- corporations. They who were descended from the Sabins (because after the death of Tatius none of them reigned with Romulus in equal dignity) were desirous to have a king, created out of their body, because they would not forgive their false and perfidious in the Empire. But the old Romans could not away with a stranger-King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affection, all were willing to set up a king, as having not tasted yet the sweetness of liberty. The Peers moreover mightily feared (by reason that the neighbor states bordering round about were provoked against them) let some foreign force might assailable their City left thus without sovereign government, and the army without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an association of rule, and made ten Decuries: and in every Decury created one to have the sovereignty over the rest. These Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy faith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty. But Dionysius writes, that there were two hundred of the Sabins & as many Romans. After this they called and their Decury unto whom the lottery first fell, ruled the City: howbeit not all of them at once, but one alone had the regal ornaments, and the leaders going before him. Five days he governed and no longer; and by this order in course the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty days. For after five days determined, the whole lot was first to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the second at the imperial dignity together with the ensigns thereof: and he again, when his five days were expired, unto a third and so to the tenth. Thus when these ten first Interregens had passed one 50 days a second Deceny of Senators in like manner ruled the City other 50 days; and thus they went round through all until they had fulfilled a years space in this regency. This government was of the thing it self called Interregnum, which name it still retained afterwards, and the men likewise were named Interregens. In this year therefore was the Magnificancy of the Interregens first devised among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregens, but also after the decease of Nummus Tullius, and Ancus Kings. In like manner during the time of the free State and Common-wealth, after the time of yeardly Magnificates expired, the said government took place very often. Before the creation of new for they held the assembly for elections, wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this Interregent was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily passed not five days) to execute all those functions in the City which belonged either to KK, or COff, namely, to minifter justice, to rule the Common-wealth, to hold a Senate, and there to propound the affairs of State, and lastly, to summon the general assembly for choosing new Magnificates. As touching the beginning of Interregens, Dionysius in his second book, Livy in his first, Plutarch in Numa, Sext. Sallust, Eusebius, and other old writers, have written at large.

43 Numa Pompiius the second K. reigned 43 years.
Numa being decaed, the Interregency took place again: during which time an Act of Senatorial advice, wherein by the approbation of the Commons and advice of the Nobles, Tullus Hostilius was created the third K. of the Romans; in the 81st year after the foundation of the City, who, having raised Alban, commanded the Albanians to be translated to Rome. Their Commons he made free denizens, and the principal Nobles he took into the order of Senators. After Numa he reigned 32 years: as all writers most constantly affirm. He perished, as Dionysius witneffeth, by occasion that his house was on fire, wherein his wife and children and all their household besides were consumed and burnt. Some say, that his palace took fire by lightning through theire of the gods, for that he had built some lattices and holy rites: others write, that it was occasioned by the treacherous practice of Ancus Martius, who reigned next after him. Of him Dionysius writeth in his 3 books: That he carried before him the name of Hostius; and it appeareth by this, that both his father and grandsire bare the said name. A Prince he was, not only far unlike to Numa, but also more fierce and Florid than Romulus.

King Tullius being departed this life, there was an Interregent by the Nobles declared, who held the assembly for election in the 114 year from the foundation of the City: wherein the people created Ancus Martius the fourth K. of the Romans, and the Senators approved the same. He built Hostius a town 16 miles distant from the City of Rome; and fought seven battles, Lucus, Dionysius, and Salwius, to that he reigned 54 years: but Enobius, Etruscus, and Caepio, 23. What death he died, neither Livy in his first book, nor Dionysius in his 3rd do set down; notwithstanding that by them his noble acts are set out at large. Now Ancus (as Sex. Pompeianus hath reported) is called, who hath an arm bowing inward, so as it cannot be put straight forth.

I. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth K. of Romans, reigned 38 years.

This Tarquinius being leaved by Ancus (when he died) guardian to his children, was the first that ambitiously intercepted the kingdom to himself; he lent the sons of Ancus, during the time of Interregency, out of the way as it were to hunting, and made an oration unto the people to win their hearts & affections to him: and so with the suffrages of the people and authority of the Nobles, he was by the Interregent declared K. in the 170 year after the foundation of Rome, and in the 41st Olympiad. This noble Prince as well for warlike prowess as peaceable policy and government at the length (being above fourscore year old) was forelaid by the secret trains of of the two sons of Ancus, Martius, in the eight and thirty year of his reign, according to Livy and Dionysius, whose judgment we follow: or in the 57th as Oppius, Meffala, Cassius, Eurypus, Caepio, Sex. Pompeius, unto whom accord Dionysius and Livy, who writeth, that the addition of Pr. was given unto him, not by men of that time wherein he lived, but by the age following. But Livy writeth plainly, that he had the surname of Pr. given him, even then when he came first into the City, because he was born before Superbus. He also was called Locomo, and was the son of Demaratus the Corinthian, descended from the family of the Orchidians.

44. Servius Tullius, the last K. of the Romans, reigned four and forty years.

After Pr. Tarquinius was slain presently Servius Tullius was the first that, without any election of the people, yet with the generall consent of the Nobles (took upon him the Roman kingdom, in the year from the foundation of the City 76, Concerning whose conception, we must not let pass that which Pliny writeth in the 56 book after this manner: During the reign of Tarquinus Pr. there appeared suddenly the gentlest member of the masculine sex upon the hearth where the fire was kept, & thenceupon presently a captive woman and bond-servant of Tarquin the Queen, named Ceres, sitting there by the fire side, conceived and was with child; and so was Servius Tullius born, who succeeded in the kingdom. Afterwards as the boy lay asleep within the K.K. palace, his head was seen on a light fire, and supposeth he was the son of the laur L. of that house. In which regard, he illustrated it the Compitibus and planes to the L. Concerning his birth, Plutarch hath written more in his book of the Romans fortune. By the crafty and subtile device of his wives mother Tarquin, he attained to the Crown in the fourth year of the fifth Olympiad, and reigned 44 years: but the villanous compot of Tarquinus his son in law, and Tullia his own daughter and Tarquinus wife, he was most impiously slain in the very street: which thereupon was called Stilurus. As touching the years of this kings reign, there controversy there is among writers: for Livy, Dionysius, and Sallust (whom we have followed) write, that he reigned 44 years: but Meffala Corvinus, Sex. Pompeius, Enobius, Caepio, Sex. Pompeius, and Bede 34 and 40 above. Howbeit, inading those ten to the reign of Tarquinius afterwards, they hinder not this great sum and computation of the years: for they let them down 55, which Livy, Dionysius, and Sallust make but 25. This K. took the name of Servius, by occasion of his own fortune, that his mother Ceres a captive (but a most beautiful and wise woman of Corinth) bare him during her bondage: but Tullius he was called, by the name of his fathers kindred, as Dionysius, which writeth in his fourth book, reckoning up many acts by him achieved,

L. Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh King of Rome, reigned 25 years.

In the second hundred and twentieth year after the foundation of the City, L. Tarquinius the younger, having killed Servius Tullius, entered upon the Roman kingdom with force of arms, nor by Interregent, nor yet any right of law. Superbus he was named for his cruel demeanour, in that he forbade to commit to earth the dead corps of his father in law by him murdered; giving out that Romulus likewise died and lay unburied. He was the son of L. Tarquiniius Priscus the King; as Q. Pisare, Au. Gellius, Lucius Maccers, Vereilius Flaccus, and Livius have written, Howbeit, Dionysius out of L. Pisæ in his Annals, by most strong reasons disproved their errour, and by the certain computation of the years sheweth how it cannot possibly be so, but rather that he was the son of Tarquiniius Priscus his son, who died in the life of Priscus. Five and twenty years he reigned according to Livy in his first book, Dionysius in his fourth, and Salius in his Polyhistor, But Cato, Deme.iius, Eutropius, and Bede, ascribe unto him five and thirty years, adding unto his reign those ten years which they took from Servius Tullius, and thereby giving occasion of errour to the later writers. Of him Dionysius, Livy, both the Plinies, Gellius, Macrobious, and Eutropius, have written much. Collect then, into one sum the year of these Kings reign, and thereof will arise the number of two hundred forty four.

Of the first Elections of Consuls.

This is the second change of the Common-weal, by occasion that Superbus the King, as well for his inmolate and proud government, as for the villany offered by Sexius the Kings son to Lucræia, was expelled, and liberty recovered: whereupon the over-saing government year by year was committed to two men who were named Prætors, for that they set free the people; then Judges, because they decided their controversies: and finally, Consuls, in that they advised and provided for the good of the Common-weal: as Cicero in the third book of Laws declareth these words: Let there be two invested in royal government: and of ruling, judging, and counsel-giving, be they called Prætors, Judges, and Consuls: let them also have the sovereignty of command in war. Now the first Consuls of Prætors were created by Sp. Lucræia (father of Lucræia, and Interregent for the time) in a generall assembly by the voices of the Centuries, according to the commentaries of Servius Tullius the King. The first Consul had all the rights-prerogatives, and regall enigns of the KK; this, only provided that both of them should not have the rods and saces carried before them, for fear of pretenting any terror to the people. Both of them were chosen out of the Paritii: which for this intent I advettile the Reader of that the progrels of the Common-weal might be known; seeing that in processes of time they came to be created out of the Commons also. Moreover, as concerning the year month and day, when as the first Consuls entered their government, something were to be laid in this place: but because we have spoken before of the variety and dispersion of Authors thereabout: therefore letting pass these circumstances, proceed we to the very Consuls, who by the testimony of all writers were first chosun: namely,

L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquiniius Collatinus.

It is recorded by all writers, that L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquiniius Collatinus, were the first Coll or Prætors of the Roman people: who in the end of the 244 year, since the foundation of the City and upon the first day of March (after the Tarquiniius K.), the father & the son were expelled the City, in an assembly of the Centuries were solemnly pronounced and declared Coll. But after that Brutus had compiled his Colleague Tarquiniius to reign up his Consulship, either because he was impeacht for the affair and name of the Tarquiniius (as L. Piso in Gellius the 15 book and 29 chap. Livius, Plutarch, and Cicero, do write): or by occasion of a variance between Brutus and Collatinus about the execution of Collatinus his killers son (as Dionysius reporteth): he laboured in his place Pub. Aelius Volusius the son of Volusius, whole helping hand he had used especially in finishing the KK. Of whole Consulship, Polbyius in the third book, Dionysius, Livy, Valerius Max., book 4, chapter, Plutarch in Pop. licola, and Pliny 36 book, chap. 15, have made mention. But Valerius, after that Brutus in his Magistracy was slain by Aruns the son of Superbus: (for the King his father had levied war against the Romans): in a general Court of all the Centuries, took unto him for his companion in government, Sp. Lucræia Tribi. pium the father of Lucræia; and to him (being the elder) submitted the preeminence of sovereignty. And soon after, within few daies upon his death, (for he was very aged) he was turned unto him M. Horatius Polyellus, for his Colleague in the Consulship. The said Valerius was called Poplicola, for that during his Magisl. tracy, he enacted certain laws very popular, and namely, concerning the appeal from the Consuls to the people, and the receiving of the flate-government from the said people, as Livius.
Livius and Dionysius do witness. In the vulgar books, as also in the old written Copies (whether by error or of purpose) we read his name evermore Publicius, but still in one and the same signification. Only the letters are a little altered, which otherwise have much affinity one with another, as Quintius writeth, namely with a, and with b. For in antique titles and inscriptions, you shall read often Publicius for Publicus. To conclude therefore, in the first year after the Kings were exiled, Cic. at Rome were thes, L. Junius Brutus, and Lu. Tar. Collatius, P. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and M. Horatius Palvillus.

P. Valerius, T. Lucretius.

The Conulship of these two is recorded unto us by Dionysius, Livius and Cassiodorus. Ossorius Panvinius, given unto Lucretius the surname of Tricipitinus, both for that it was a peculiar addition to that house; and also, because by an ancient Chronologer in the records of Cnufinius, he is named Tricipitinus. Now for Publicius, the Etymology thereof according to Sextus, is twofold: For some call him Pub, who hath been brought up at the publicke charges: others again name him fo, who was a ward before he had his name given him.

P. Lucretius, P. Valerius Publicola.

Livius calleth this Lucretius by the forename of P, but other books of Titus, Dionysius writeth, that P. Valerius Publicola the third time, and M. Horatius the second time were Co, Plutarch speaketh of the third Conulship only of P. Valerius, Osorius and Sigenius follow Dionysius. As for Cassiodorus, he leaveth out altogether these Consuls.

Sp. Lucretius, T. Herminius.

After Publicola the third time, and Pucicoll the second time Consuls, Dionysius hath placed Sp. Lucretius and T. Herminius. The same dooth Cassiodorus. And the book noted by Cassiodorus, under an unknown author, hath in it thus written, Publicola 11, & Pucicoll Rufe & Aquilinos: Valerius Tiberio, Livy omittheth these Consuls, and in their place puttheth down M. Valerius, and P. Pucicollis: But as Sigenius thinketh, the fault is in the writers of the book.

But that this year should necessarily come between, Osorius thinketh, according to the book of M. Tullius Cicero entitled Brutius and certain it is, that Titius Pleccius in his Capitoline tables hath not rejected their Consuls. Now this name Lucretius is derived of Laru, and so ought it to be written, and not Lucretius; as corruptly it is to be seen in some Copies of Livy and Dionysius. As for the surname to Hermioni, Osorius upponeth it to have been Egerius, both for that the mention of that surname appeareth in a fragment of the Capitoline marble, as also because of what family else it should be, no writer ever hath delivered. This Sp. Lucretius was the brother of Titus Lucretius the first Dictator, as writeth Dionysius.

M. Valerius, P. Pafimius.

Plutarch, as also Dionysius and Livius writeth, that this M. Valerius was brother to M. Valerius Publicola, and therefore truly is he said to be the fohn of Valerius. Pafimius for his surname had Tiberius. Witness Zonara; together with Plutarch in Publicola, and Dionysius in the fifth and sixth books. Him Dionysius calleth the brother of Quintus, where he treateth of the Consular Embassadors sent unto the Commons in the year 260. This Pafimius, as Osorius teacheth, was by old authors written without the aspiration (b), either because of Pefius, Pafimius, and Pafimius, and so Pafimius is derived, or for that in old time they wrote omnibus without the aid (b). Now is he called Pafimius, who was born late, as Cæcilius writeth in his commentaries of ancient readings. Howbeit, lawyers pronounce the word with the aspiration, and call by that name him only, who was born after his fathers death: and with them accord Varro and Plutarch in the life of Sylus.

P. Valerius IIII T. Lucretius.

Dionysius, Livius, Plutarch and Cafoleorbus, report the like for Cic. this year. But the registrers of Cnufinius deliver unto us Publicola the fourth time, and Tricipitinus Valerius Maximi in the fourth book and fourth chapter writeth thus, Valerius Publicola began his Consulship with Brutus; and the same man bare three Consuls afterwards, to the great contentment of the people.

Agrippa Menenius, P. Paflimius.

Dionysius hath for Cic. this year, Agrippa Menenius Laetus, and L. Paflimius the second time, Lucius Cafoleorus, Cnufinius book, and the Greek records disagree not from him. Valerius Max. 4, book, 4, cap. corruptly calleth him M. Menenius Agrippa. Now Agrippa are they called, who are born into the world with extraordinary throws & birth-travels of their mothers, namely, not with their heads, but their feet forward, against nature.

Joins, Zonara, and Cafoleorus, name them Consuls barely thus. Dionysius yet is more liberal, calling Sp. Cestius, Viscellinus; and Opter Virgininus, Tricipitus. But whom Dionysius calleth Castrullus, Cicero in his Latin termeth Caflinius Recellinus, and Cnufinius Kalender, Viscellinus. For fifth of Viscellinus came Viscellinus, and so from thence they derive Viscellinus, Opter (to note that by the way) as Sex. Poppleius hath is his whole father died before his grandfathers And the word foundeth itself much, as if he were born after his fathers death; "ot because he taketh his grandfathers name for his father."

Livy and Caecilinors allow to these no surnames at all. The Sicilian Records give to Sulpicius the addition of Corinnius, like as the Calendar of Cipbonius, and to Tullius of Longus; as also doth Dionysius, who writeth, that Marcus Tullius died in the time of his Magnificacy and that in his place there was none substituted because the year was weare at an end. Of this M. Tullius, Cicero speaketh in his Brutus, saying, As if I should at each my left to be defended of M. Tullius the Patrician, who in the tenth year after the expulsion of the KK, was Cof, with Ser. Sulpicius. This surname Marcus, as Sext. Pompeius faith, cometh hereupon that some one was born here, i.e., in the morn, like as Lucius, who entred into the world by daylight, and in another place, this Man[n]is (ed he) consecrated the field Nemores, from whom many noble and famous men sprung, and continued many years. Wherupon are the Proverbs, Mutti Mati Aricia, i.e., there be many Mutti at Aricia. Moreover, he was called Servius, who came of parents (either both or one at least) which were in bondage, or else, who when his mother was dead, lived still in her womb, and so was saved.

Vetinius, T. Eunius.

The forename of this Vitinius or Vetinius in some Copics of Livy, as Marilus Vetinius in his annals of Cof, is Castor in other Owens in Caecilinors. Lucius in Dionysius Pulilus: who also surnamed Vetinius, Verminius, and T. Eunius Helius, and in some place Vasilius, but faultily; for the late writers also affirm his surname to be Helius. The Greek Records likewise have Helius and Geminius. Moreover, they that write him Vetinius, imitate the ancient manner of putting it, as when they call men Filius, Velius, and Papius; but they who call him Vetinius follow the latter usage. Of this manner Livy speaketh in the year 292.

C. Claudius, T. Lartius.

This say Livy and Caecilinors: but Dionysius Surnamed T. Lartius, Felinus, and Q. Claudius, Siculus, to whom Card the registers both of Caecilinors and Selfy. This T. Lartius is the same, as appeareth by Dionysius, who before was Scof, and therefore is his surname Felinus, rightly added. The house of the Claudi as also of the Juli Sero Li. 17. in with Caecilinors and Quintus, defended from the Alban first, as Dionysius writeth.

An. Sempronius, M. Minucius.

Thus Livy and Caecilinors deliver unto us thei Cof, but Caecilinors register and the Sicilian surname them Ariminus and Augustus, and Dionysius nameth them An. Sempronius, Bessus, and M. Minucius Augustus, albeit he maketh no mention of Ariminus, but in the second Consilius of Minucius. As for Ancus, he was so called, who being new born was nobilitated and folitered by the gods.

Thus are these Cof, set down by Dionysius, Livy, and Caecilinors. And to them verify the Greek records put to the surnames of Albus and Cilimontanor. But the book of Caecilinors ad des Regilenses and Tirisius befoies; so that by them they are thus written, An. Posthumius, Albus Regilenses, and T. Virginius Tirisius Cilimontanor.

App. Claudius, and P. Servilius.

Livius and Caecilinors record these of Cof, this year. The registers as well of Caecilinors as Sicily, Sabins, and Pusilis: But Dionysius much more fully, App. Claudius, Sabins, and P. Servilius Prusil. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudius kindred, first named, Attius Claudius, and afterwards, App. Claudius, who from Regillius, a City of the Sabins (whereupon he was called, Sabins Regilenses) came to Rome in the twelfth of a fiftieth year after the foundation of the City, and was ranged among the Patricii, as Livy, Dionysius, and Sabinus in Tirisius make report. This man was godlike to that App. Claudius the December. As reaching his forename, there is some difference, where of ye may see Onapius and Martyius in their Kalenders.

A. Virginius, and T. Vetsius.

Here are thus set down by Livy and Caecilinors, as here they be named. Dionysius writeth them, A. Virginius Mucunus, and T. Vetsius Geminus. The registrs of Caecilinors, barely Mucunus and Geminus. The Sicilian Cilimontanor and Geminus. Mucunus and Cilimontanor both are one, Pusilis upon the Nation of Ciceror for Cornelia, calleth them Caecilinors, A. Virginius Tirisius, and L. Virginius Cilimontanor; whereby it may be understood, that both of them had two surnames, to wit, the one, Tirisius Cilimontanor and the other, Geminus Cilimontanor; for to elewhere other writers tellith, Caecilinors obserueth, that this Cilimontanor, is also called Cilimontanor by some writers.

O Livius and Dionysius, of them speaketh Cicero also in his Oration for Cornelius. But Cassius's books let forth unto us, Vestal senators, & Annomus and The Sicilian records, Annomus, and Vestal senators, and that the name were Contuls together in this yeare, and enterd upon their government the first of September, sooner then the custom was, as Dionysius writeth.

T. Gensinus and P. Minutius.

Dionysius in the beginning of the seventh book nameth for Coff. this yeare T. Gensinus Macrinus, and P. Minutius. The same both Livius in the second book, Caiusiores likewise and Efemios. Or the like in the second book and first chapter, leaving out one of their surnames. But the Greek records and Cassiusians book surname them both, the one Marcuserius, the other Angerius. And there are ordinary surnames, this to Minutius, and the former to the Gensan.

M. Minutius, and As, Sempironius.

O Livy and Cassius let them down, omitting their surnames, as also the numeral note II. But Dionysius recordeth them fully in this manner, A. Sempironius Aquinianus the second time, and M. Minutius Angerius likewise the second time. This yeare reckoneth Dionysius for the nineteneighth after that Poppisola the Cof. publishe the law of appealing.

Sp. Natusius and Sex., Furius.

After A. Sempironius and M. Minutius Coff. Dionysius bringeth in success to them, Q. Sulpicius Camerius, and Sp. Lentius Flavus the second time. Cassiusian regitles, Cornutus and Flavius, the Sicilian, Camerius and Flavius. Moreover, Cornutus is an ordinary surname to the Sulpts, as may be gathered of the Capitoline tables of Rone. And that yeare Coff. are not to be left out, either according to the account of the Capitol, or to make up and digget the sum gathered by Varro, appeareth by the Triumph of P. Valerius, which would not fall to the yeare 279, it we should deduct those Coff.out of the Kalender.

T. Siconius and C. Aquilus.

Next after the former Contuls, there followd according to Dionysius, C. Iulius Iulius and P. Pinarus Rufus Contuls. Cassiusian his records deliver unto us, Iulius and Mamerius: But the Greek, Iulius and Rufus. And that Mamerius is a surname to the Pinarus, appeareth by another place. Thence Contuls Livy over-paseth, like as the other the yeare before; upon whom, they that undertook the explication of the Capitoline tables have noted, that there want Contuls for two yeares. So that of himself the like may be said to that which he writeth in the ninth book of Pifo, in this manner: [These Contuls, Pifo bringeth in immediately after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out two yeares whereof we have reported that Claudius and Polumius were Contuls in the one, and Cornelius with Martius in the other.] Whether he forget them in the digeting of the Annals, or of purpose passed by them (notwithstanding he thought of those two couple of Contuls,) it is uncertain. Moreover, the surname of C. Iulius was transformed every where into Iulius and Tubius; but that it is to be read Iulius, both Martianus, and also after him Polumius likewise. For this surname Iulius is left from Ascanius, the son of Aeneas, and from the said surname is derived the denomination of a family: and therefore Virgils faith, The Iulian house at Rome, first came From Iulius great, a prince of name. And Livy speaking of the same in this wise faith; which Iulius, the house of the Iulian avouch for the author of their name.

But to leave their things; Sp. Natusius and Sex. Furius, are by Dionysius, Livius, and Cassiusians ranged Contuls in this yeare. In Cassiusian his Annals, there is Rutius, the surname of Natusius, and likewise Vestal in Cassiusians, but in the Sicilian, Natusius and Rufus.

Servins Cornelius, Q. Fabius.

According to Livy the Contuls this yeare were T. Siconius, and C. Aquilus, whom Dionysius and Cassiusians name to be T. Siconius and C. Aquilus. The surnames of these by the Greek records and Cassiusians Kalender, were Tuscius and Sabinius. As for Aquilus, he was so called (as Martianae abterver) who was a quilo coloris, of a dusky black, or brownish colour.

Livy sauceth Contuls for this yeare, Sp. Cassius and Procclus Virginianus and Dionysius sp. Cassius the second time, with Procclus Virginianus, and Diodorus in his eleventh book, unto Virginianus addeth the name Tuscusfur. The Greek records, as also those of Cassiusian make mention of Rutius and Vestal, now as concerning the name of Procclus, some think they be so called, for that they were born when their parents were old, gnaus, Procclus est geregis, tar leapt in yeares.
M. Fabius, L. Valerius, Diodorus, in his said 20 book, declares Q. Fabius Volbulus, and Servius Cornelius Caffius, for this year's Cons. They have done Diodorus Livy, and Caffiadorni, saying that they leave out the story of Caffius, (though it may be resolved) men were named Caffi in the old time, who had rivel'd and wrinkled bodies, like to the wood-worms breeding in trees, called Caffius. Diodorus in his 17 book and 24 chapter, says: Ryo and varnishes hath brought the use at the table of the damner wood-worms breeding in oaks. Hereupon Saint Jerome against Tertullian: In Ptolemy (quoth he) and Philo, it is counted high and delicate fare to eat Xyl phlogiston, to be called their plump and fat worms which came of rotten wood, and among them are reckoned to yield a great revenue and commodity to the housetaker. Of them the Romans took their names of Caffius, Caffius, Caffius, and Caffius.

Q. Fabius, C. Iulius.

L. Emilius the son of Mammertus, and C. Fabius the son of Confuli, are by Diodorus recorded the Consuls of this year. Livy and Caffiadorni approved the fame. Diodorus likewise, saying that he addeth to L. Emilius the surname of Mammertus: but they leave out the fore names of their fathers. The Greek records have Mammertus and Fabius. As for the surname of Mammertus, Diodorus give it unto Emilius himself in the third Consulship. Moreover, Sex. Pompeius affirmeth, that the kindred Emilia took name of Mammertus the son of Pythagoras the Philosopher, who for his singular humanitie, was the surname Emilius, but as he saith Emilius was a name and not a surname. Now was this Emilius the son of Mammertus, as witnesses Diodorus.

M. Fabius, C. M. Manlius.

Diodorus matcheth together in the Consulship this year, C. Iulius and Q. Fabius. Livius and Caffiadorni, Q. Fabius and C. Manlius. The Sicilian regiters and Caffiadorni Iulius and Fabius.

K. Fabius, T. Virginiss.

Diodorus writeth, that C. Fabius the second time, and Sp. Virginiss Iulius were Confuls this year: but Livy, and Caffiadorni put in head of them, Q. Fabius and C. Iulius. The Sicilian regiters, as also Caffiadorni, Iulius and Fabius.

L. Emilius, T. Servius.

By the testimony of Diodorus, there followed Confuls next after, M. Fabius the second time, and C. Manlius. But Diodorus, Livius, and Caffiadorni, deliver unto us M. Fabius and C. Manlius for Confuls. The Greek records, name Fabius the second time, and C. Manlius, Caffiadorni book hath Volbulus the third time. The Capitoline stone neweth, C. Manlius the son of Publius.

C. Horatius, T. Menenius.

P. Virginiss, C. Servius, Diodorus in Diodorus, and Diodorus, make report of Caff Fabius to have been Conful this year with T. Virginissus the Sicil regiters, Fabius with Rustius Diodorus, of a Conful the brother of the Conful, which gave him his place, was a third Consul this year. And Livy saith, that T. Virginissus Rustius died in time of the pestilence the 290 year.

A. Virginiss, Sp. Servius.

According to Livy, Diodorus, and Caffiadorni, the Consuls this year were L. Emilius and C. Servius; but Diodorus nameth, L. Emilius Mammertus with C. Cornelia Lusnaus: the Sicilian regiters, Amilus with Efginius. Another fragment of the Capitoline stone, only Servius Adda: with Efginius substituteth in his room. Moreover, Mammertus (as Sex. Pompeius writeth) is an Oecane fore-name; who addeth, that the house Emilius was so called of Mammertus the son of Pythagoras the Philosopher, who for his passing courtesie was lurnamed Emilius.

C. Nautilis, P. Valerius.

L. Virginiss, Caffiadorni, Diodorus, and Diodorus, put down for Conv. T. Menenius and C. Horatius. As for Diodorus, he addeth unto Horatius the surname of Patellinus; and the Capitoline stone lurnamed Menenius, Lusnaus. And even in both the Caffiadorni Calendar and the Sicilian regiters, are to be seen Lusnaus and Patellinus. Of theselfe Confs, Caffiadorni make mention in the 17 book & 13 chap. but not without fault.

L. Erius, A. Manlius.

L. Virginiss, Caffiadorni, and Diodorus, let down for Conv. A. Virginissus and Servius Servius, Diodorus, A. Virginissus Tricofrus, and C. Servius Servius. In Caffiadorni his kalender, Virginissus, for his surname hath Rustius: and the Capitol in roles, give Servius to Servius; the Sicilian records have both.
L. Eumylis, Opiter, Virginins, or, Popisus Iulius,

For and Caddedorus nominat for this year CoIs. L. Papiri, and A. Namins, Dionysus, P. Valerius, and C. Nautins, Diodes, P. Valerius, Popisus, and C. Namins, Rarus. The Sicilian regentes, thus Namins and Popisus, Capiolins, and Rarus. The Capital bones, having for Rarus, Rarus: like as Dionysus before in Lautins, for Rarus puteth down Flavins.

Dionysus would have L. Eumylis Manner- ens to be Conul the third time this year, with Volosus Iulius: but Livis, L. Eumylis and Opiter Virginins. Howbeit he faith that in some Annals he found Popisus Iulius, in feed of Virginins. And them Diodorus, the Greek records, and the avowers of the Conuls tables within the Capitol, have followed. In the fragments whereof is read Iulius, which is a furnish- ing of the Iulius. And therefore in the Sicilian regentes, it is thus written, Eumylis and Iulius; but in those of Capiolins, Mannerens, and Popisus, Caddedorus hath followed Livis. Moreover, Appius is a peculiar name of the Claudius, which no citizen else of Rome died: because it was a strange name.

Livins, Dionysus, and Caddedorus, name for this year Conuls, L. Papiri, and Lu. Furini, Diodes, L. Paterius Mannerens, and P. Furins cannot but vallueably, as Sigenins and Onuphins think. Of these CoI. M. Vario maketh mention and Macrobius in the first book of the Saturnins.

T. Numanins Prifenis, A. Virginins.

Dionysus faith, the Conuls of this year were App. Claudius the son of Appius, Pomerius Sabius, and T. Quintins Capiolins, Livis leaveth out their furnames.

T. Quintins, P. Servilins.

Joy and Caddedorus let down for Conuls this year, T. Eumylis and L. Valerius. Dio-

T. Eumylis, Q. Fabius.

Dionysus, faith for Conuls this year, A. Virginins Montanus (whom the Greek records call Calimontanus) and T. Numanins Prifenis, Diodes, Livins, and Caddedorus, conceal their furnames: and whom the Sicilian regentes name Calimontanus; Capiolins calleth Numanins.

286

In Dionysus we read for this year Conuls Quinins Capiolins, and Q. Servilins Prifenis, Livins and Caddedorus, are silent for their furnames: but in Diodorus there be T. Quintins, & Q. Servilins. In Capiolins Kalender, Capiolins and Prifenis in the Sicilian regentes, Calimontanus and Prifenis.

Q. Fabius, T. Quintins.

Livins, and Caddedorus match together in Conuls with this year, T. Eumylis and Q. Fabius. Dionysus, T. Eumylis the II. time, and Q. Fabius, The Sicilian regentes, Eumylis & Vibulins, Capiolins Mannerens and Vibulins, Diodes, Eumylis Mannerens and Q. Fabius Vibulins. This is that Fabius who after wardes was four times Conul and was the only Fabius that surived, when the Fabii were slain in Cre- miera: not a child at the time of fourteen years of age, but a servicable and an active man of his hands, (as Dionysus reporteth) and was the son of Marcus, a man who had been Conul;

This year had for Conuls, Q. Servilins and Sp. Paphhumins, as Livy and Caddedorus report: but Prifenis and Albus, as Capiolins faith. And by Dionysus his tellimony, Sp. Paphhumins, Albus, and Servilins, Prifenis the second time; Diodorus nameth Q. Servilins Prifenis the second time; but Diodorus nameth Q. Servilins & Sp. Paphhumins Albus. Howbeit, in the fragment of the Capitol marble, Sp. Paphhumins a furnamed Albus Regillus, and not Albus, and so Marilins thinketh it ought to be read.

L. Livins, T. Quintins, Q. Fabius

Caddedorus, T. Quintins the second time, and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus, T. Quinis Capiolins, and Q. Fabius, Dionysus Tt. Quintins Capiolins the third time, and Q. Fabius Vibulins the second time.

Still 2
According to the Capitoline table,

L. Lucetius Trecipitis, T. Vetinius Gemnius

According to the Capitoline table, Anius Polibius; out of Livy, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, Pub, Enuis Fusus, are noted for Consul this year. Diiodorus puteth to Fusus the only gentle surname Mealiinis: for Fusus. This A. Polibius was the son of A. Polibius: the dictator.

P. Volmissus, Serv. Sulpius.

C. Claudius, son of Appius, P. Valerius Pollicola.

Q. Fabius Vulbius, III. L. Corneli, Maliginus.

Livy and Cassiodorus profess for Consul this year, P. Volmissus and Serv. Sulpius, Dionysius, P. Volmissus, and Serv. Sulpius Cameornis. The Capitol marbles have P. Volmissus Amantius Galley. Of the same Consul Valerius speaks in, his first book and sixth chapter.

L. Minemnis, C. Natrius.

Livy and Dionysius name, P. Valerius Publilica, and C. Claudius Sabinius: Consuls for this year: Diodorus, P. Valerius Pollicola, and C. Claudius R. egilinnus. The Sicilian regillers & Casspius, call them Pollicola and Sabinius. The Capitoline marble hath this record, P. Valerius P. F. [son of P.] Volvis N. i., the sons son of Volvicus, surnamed Pollicola, but Livy, Dionysius, Orovins & that they have ranged the Co. in the Capitol, have reported that P. Valerius the Consul was slain in the battle against the bondslaves who this year (under the leading of Ap. Herinnus the Sabine) held the Capitol by force, and that in his Read L. Quintius Cincinnatus was substituted.

Q. Minemnis, C. Horatius Pulvillius.

Livy, together with Cassiodorus, declare for Consul this year, Q. Fabius the third time, and L. Cornelius Maliginus, Dionysius, Q. Fabius, Vulbinus the third time, and L. Cornelius: Diodorus, Q. Fabius Vulbinus and L. Cornelius Again, the Sicilian regillers, and Casspius Vulbinus and Maliginus. The Capitol marble, C. Fabius Vulbinus the third time.

M. Valerius, Sp. Virgininius.

Both Livy and Cassiodorus, deliver unto us for Consul, L. Minemnis and C. Natrius, Dionysius, L. Minemnis and C. Natrius the second time, Diodorus, Minemnis, naffiis, and C. Natrius, Ruffinius. The Capitol Romes C. Natrius, and C. Ruffinius the second time. What this surname naffiis should mean, Siganius, and Onuppius, contesse they know nor, and think in Read thereof; we should read for Siganius, Valerius, Maximus (5 book 2 chap.) thyroidal pecions were the Consul corruptly, Q. for Natrius and Minemnis.

Livy and Cassiodorus name for Cons. this year Q. Minemnis and M. Horatius Pulvillius; but herein they do amiss, as Siganius and Onuppius susposst for the same Livy writeth, that Caint Horatius Pulvillus died being Augur in the year 302, Diodorus nameth L. Polbimnus and M. Horatius, Dionysius Q. Horatius and Q. Minemnis, The Capitol records, C. Horatius Pulvillus, and the Sicilian regillers, Pulvillus and Augurinus.

In Livy and Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, we find Cons. this year, [Valerius with S. Virgininius. But in the twelfth book of Diodorus M. Valerius Laelius, and S. Virgininius Tricostus. In Casspius Kalender Maximus and Calimontinus. In the Sicilian, Maximus and Virginins. In that of the Capitol, M. Valerius Max. As for Laelius, Plince theweth, that it is a surname of the Valeriii. Of these Consuls also, Conferius maketh mention in his discourse of the plate called Seculars'

P. Cariarius, Sext. Quinquilus.

T. Livius. P. Sestius Capitolinus.

Sparius Tarpeius son of M. and nephew of M. furnamed Montanus Capitolinus, the Kalender of Verres Flaccus shewed unto us for one Conulis this year. Of whom, Diodorus, Dioyesius, Livy, Pedanius, upon Cicero his notation for Cornelius, and Caffodorus make mention only of the surnames. Capitoinus book, and the Greek records, have Capitolinus. As for his colleague, they differ and disagree. For Diodorus would have him to be Anius Aferius Ventudalis; but Dionysius Anius Tereminius. Livy and Pliny, the seventh book, chapter seven and twenty, A. Servius. Sestius chapter q, Cest. t book, chapter II. A. Servius. Latly, Caffodorus, Aw. Aferius, whom Sestius and Omphrhis follow.

Livy and Caffodorus likewise report for this yeer Conulis, Sext. Quintusius and P. Carrius. Dionysius, Sex. Quintusius and Heratus, Diodorus, Ext. Quintusius Tergemius. The Capitol flowed his name Sex. Quintusius, son of Sex. nephew of Pub. For this surname Tergemius is common both to the Horatii and Curatii, but Sestius and Omphrhis allow Horatii rather.

Sex. Quintusius son of Sexius, nephew of Pub.

To this Conulis the Greek records give the turn of Varns, and to the Capitoline tables of those do represent him. But Dionysius, Dionysius, Livy, and Caffodorus deliver the same man unto us without the surname. Who was his colleague, it is doubtful. For by Dionysius is was P. Horatius: by Livy and Caffodorus, Pub. Curatius: by Diodorus, Tergemius, which is the surname as well of the Curtius, as the Horatius. Omphrhis rather approveth of Curtius.

Decemvirs Consular.

Livy and Diodorus, together with the Capitoline regislers (as far forth as may be gathered by the broken fragments of the tables) shew that App. Claudius and T. Genius were Cofl. elect for this year, but they resigned the place, in regard of creating Decemvirs. Now at this touching this Decemvirs, the law Terentius brought it into the common weal: that law A. Terentius Argus, a Tribune of the Commons promulged as touching five Quinquevirs to be created, who should set down laws to guide the Commons authority. For the Commons complained, that their government was too vast and tolerable, and therefore required that it should be abated and made more moderate. But this law, after he had been for five years toge-ther, was but abated by the Trib. to no effect.

In the end waxed cold again, by reason that the said Trib obtained a great to double their own number. But afterwards upon the occasion that Romulus and Petronius the Coastlare themselves to extrem in rigor against the Com. refusing warfare, the said law was set on foot again, and but followed more holily then before. Whereupon upon the L. I. of the Senat were doubtefull what to do: at length they resolved upon this, whereof the principal adviser was T. Romilius) to create certain lawgivers, who should set down the rights and privileges both of nobles and commons. And look what ordinances by them were decreed, the same should bind both the one part and the other. The Com. agreed to this determination: and three Em-} bare the soveraigne port, with his i 2 Liüors before him; the other nine had but one sergeant apeece to give attendance: and the singular concord among themselves, which otherwises was an agreement profitable when they were private, proved exceeding great equity to others.

By this time the Commons, besides that they deteated the name of Coff, no less than KK, found no mifs of the Tribuns afference, nor sought once after it, seeing the Decemvirs yield one onto another in reciprocal appealing. With great affection therefore and endeavour, as well of nobles as commons, there were created for this year also Decemvirs in Consuls authority absolutely without appeal, Ap. Claudius the second time, Q. Fabius who had been four times Consul, M. Cornélus Malagonius brother of L. Cornelius, who had been Consul in the year 295; M. Sergius, L. Minucius, T. Antonius Merenda, M. Rabulius: and three likewife of the Commons, Q. Petitus, K. Dalinius, and Sp. Oppius Cornicius, as witneseth Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livy: although the gentle names for the most part are by Diodorus omitted.

W hen the more part of the former yer was past, and that upon the adding of two other tables to the former ten, there remained no more to doe, (in case the said tables were once in the high court and assembly of the Centuries passed) why the common-wealth should have any need of the Decemvirs, inso- much as the commons expected, that soon after, the solemn court and assembly aforesaid for creation of Consuls should be publishéd: then the Decemvirs without any word at all made of that election or assembly, came aboard guarded with whole troops of young gentlemen Patricians, and demeaned themselves more proudly and insolently to every man. But before the year was fullyexpired, by occasion of the lecherous list of Ap. Claudius, who challenged a maiden (one of the commons daughters) as a bond-servant, according as Livy more at large writeth: and also of the commons insolent and departing into the Avenue, the foresaid Decemvirs gave over their Magisunity; and when Q. Fabius the high Pontifex called a general assembly of the tribes, ten Tribuns of the Commons were again chosen: and so at length in another assembly of Centuries for the Consuls, holden by the Interregent, created there were Consuls,

L. Valerius Petitus, M. Haratius Barbaeus.

The Consuls Ouphrósis caieth upon a third year of the Decemvirs (although Livy feemeth to differ) to the end that he might jump with the account of the Capitol, which he supposeth to be collected by Varro for by their calculation the triumphs of these Consuls declared in the Capitol records, are engraven upon this very year, i. 304: so as it appeareth evidently, that part of this year was taken up by the Decemvirs, and part by the Consuls, Tácitus and Rufus write, that the Decemvirs continued but two years.

L. Livius puteth down for Consuls, Sp. Heremius and T. Verginius Calvus Animus, C. Diodorus faith L. Heremius and T. Verginius, Dionsis writeth, L. Heremius, T. Diodorus thus: L. Heremius, T. Diodorus the Greek records, Heremius, Tirofis: whereby Ouphrósis feareth that it is corruply written in Diodorus, Struilius for Tirofis: for Struilius was a surname of the Servili and not of the Virginis. As for his colleague Heremius, that he is to be fore-named Lar, besides Diodorus and Dionsis, Valerius also sheweth in his tenth book, where he writeth thus: The fore-name of Lar is derived from the Laris.

M. Gregorius Macerinus, C. Juluis.

Thefe are recorded likewise to be the Consuls this year. The surname Macerinus is supprefed by Caffidorus and Diodorus, who also nameth the other L. Juluis. In Dionsis certain pages be wanting in this place, Caflinius his Kalender hath for Macerinus, Macerinus.

T. Quinxtus Capitolinus III. Agrippa Furius.

Dionsis and Livy both, name the Coff, of this year, T. Quinxtus Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius, Diodorus and Caffidorus conceal the surname and the numeral note of four. The Greek records have Furius and Capitolinhus, Ouphrósis unto Furius addeth the surnames of the grandfere, to wit, Medullinus Furius.

M. Genutius, C. Curtius.

Livy deliveth unto us for Coff, this year, M. Genutius, and P. Curtius, Caffidorus likewise M. Genutius and P. Curtius: but Dionsis, M. Genutius and C. Quinxtus: and Diodorus hath, M. Genutius and Agrippa Curtius Chilo. But as Sigonius, and after him Ouphrósis have noted, it is fully read in Livy, Curtius for Curtius; and that is proved by the authority of Varro de lingua Latina: and therefore in the Sicilian registers written they are, Genutius and Curtius.

A. Semp. Atratus, Military Tribus in Cons, T. Claudius, Sula to the authority whose L. Asilus, designation Consuls were chosen in their rooms.

L. Paprinos Magilanus, L. Sempronius Atratus.

W hen C. Cannelius a Tribune of the Commons, had the former year published a second second law. That one of the Consuls should be created out of the Commons, (whereby the dignity of the Patricians was emaii) the nobles fearing lest the said law would pass in deed, managed their heads, drew to a point: whereof C. Clodius made the first motion and was the adviser. That in stead of Consuls there should be created military Tribunes, three of the Patricians, and as many of the Commons; who being endowed with Consular authority, should govern the common-wealth. Also, that when their years government was expired, the advice both of Senate and the people should be once again required, Whether they would have Consuls rather than Tribunes consul? and look which pleased them; they should be created. These points being resolved upon and decreed, three military Tribunes were created only, all Patricians: and well enough were the Commons content therewith, because themselves were eligible and capable of that dignity. Howbeit, this regiment of theirs newly set up, stood not firmly established. For within three months after, by a decree of the Augurs, they resigned up their honourable place, as if there had been some error committed in their election: and then T. Quintus Barbatus (nominated Intercursus) created Consuls, L. Papirius Mucianus, and L. Sempronius Aretius. The Consuls are left out in the Sicilian registers. Well faith Livy therefore, that these Consuls are found neither in ancient annals and yearly records, nor yet in the Kalender of the Magistrates. But Cicero makes mention of them in his Epistle to Papirius Paccus.

311. M. Papirius Mucianus, T. Quintus Capitolinus.

Dionysus and Cassiodorus avouch these for Consuls this year. As for Dionysius, he faid that they entered in the month of December. Cassius concealeth both their surnames, and Diodorus the one, namely, Capitolinus. The Greek records have Mucianus the second time, and Capitolinus the third time, Zonaras nameth them Mucianus and Barbatus.

312. M. Fab. Vibullianus, Poemenius Ebunius Corneminus.

Livy faid, that Consuls of this year, were fo named, Diodorus and Cassiodorus are silent in their surnames. The Greek records have Vibullianus and Helena, Diodorus attributeth to Ebunius the surname of Ebunius, but what manner of addition that might be, Sopodria knoweth not, and thinketh that it should be read, Ebunius.

313. C. Forbis Pacilus, M. Papirius Cassius.

These Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus are in the same represented unto us. But by Diodorus after this, Q. Forbis Eufius, and Mucianus Papirius Cassius. And by the Greek records thus, Pacius and Cassius.

P. Papirius Mucianus, L. Mucianus Lusanius.

Livy and Cassiodorus, deliver these Consuls thus fully named, Proculus Geganius Macrinus, and L. Mucianus Lusanius, Diodorus, T. Mucianus, and Proculus Geganius Macrinus. The Sicilian registers, Mucianus and Lusanius.

315. T. Quintus, Capitellius VI, A. Mucianus Lusanius.

By Livy and Cassiodorus, there were the Consuls for this year; but after Diodorus, T. Quintus, and T. Mucianus. According to the Sicilian rolls, Mucianus and Capitolinus.

The Tribunes of the Commons imported and prevailed, that there should be an election holden for Tribunes military, rather than Consuls: making no doubt, but in the chusing of six (for so many now by law might be created) some of the committers by making profession that they would be revenged for the death of Mucianus, would step into the place: howbeit the Commons created no more than three Tribunes with Consular authority, and among them L. Quintus the son of Cincinnatus. In which election, Mucianus Eumylus, a right honorable man and of great worth, was by their suffrages preferred before Q. Initials, and Lucius they made the third. In like manner, Diodorus nameth three Tribunes military for this year; but in this fort, M. Eumylus Mancius, C. Julius, and L. Quintus.

When the Commons, together with their Tribunes were quiet, and carefully regarded the main state of the Common-wealth, no question there was not controversy, but that Caffu, were chosen, to wit, M. Papirius Mucianus the third time, and L. Sergius, to wit Livius, Cassiodurus doth the time, but that he fetteth down the names of the Caffu, only in this wife, M. Papirius the third time, and L. Sergius, without surnames, Diodorus likewise, M. Papirius and L. Sergius, Caffianus Kalender, and the Sicilian registers, Mucianus and Fidenus. For this Sergius was surnamed Fidenus (as Livy reporteth) by occasion of the war which he made against the Fidenus.

Livy and Cassiodurus report these above-named for this year Consuls, Diodorus nameth them, L. Papirius and A. Corn, Mucianus: but doublets not without error, as Sopodria supposed: for both in Caffianus Kalender and the rolls of Sicily, we find Maluginensis and Cassius.

M. Fabius Vibulans. Tribunes militaries in Consuls authority.
M. Sergius Veditus, L. Fesitus.

The Tribunes of the Commons in their omissions continually forbid the the elections of Consuls: and when they had brought it so about, that the government was at the point of interregency, they war the matter in the end, that the military Tribunes might be chosen with Consular authority. But reward of this victory which they Shot at, namely, to have a commoner created, they obtained none: for out of the Patritii, namely M. Fabius Vibulans, M. Fesitus, L. Sergius Veditus. Thus much Livy, Diodorus; likewise nameth there: but corruptly, to wit, M. Fabius, M. Gallicus, and L. Servilius. As for Fesitus, in some of the Capitol monuments, he is written Flaccus or and not Fesitus, as in the common editions of Livy, whom Diodorus calleth Gallicus.

T he Commons carried is clear, that no Consul this year were created for four there were elected military Tribunes in Consuls authority; namely, T. Quintus Penum immediately up-on his Consulship, M. Pfeunianus, C. Furius, & C. Cornelius, Cossar. Thus writeth Livy; and the same Diodorus nameth.

A. Sempronius Atratianus.
L. Quintus Cincinnatus.
Tribuns Military in
L. Furris Medullinus.
Consuls authority.
L. Horatius Barbatus.

These abovenamed (as Livy reporteth) were Tribuns military in Consuls authority this year. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames, and L. Horatius full and whole.

330
L. Sergius Vidius.
Sex. Julius Lusius.
Sen..

These Tribunes military in Consuls authority, Livy leeteth down for this year. The same both Diodorus also nameth, all but their surnames, and App. Claudius whom he called Tri-tai. Livy moreover saith, that there were two of them, Quintus Numiani Sidulius, Tribunes in those days: but no doubt, as Diodorus thinketh, there is some error in the copies of the book the one who is now the first time, and a second time shall be in the year 338: the other, who was full in the year 335, and once again in the year 359. The Capitol monuments of Rome have the time: but they shew that the one was but once, and the other three times.

C. Sempronius Atratianus. Q. Fabius Vabicilus.

The Consuls this year were created according to Livius and Cassiodorus, C. Sempronius Atratianus and Q. Fabius Vabicilus, [Diodorus overpaith them] whom Livy reporteth to have entred into government, upon the ideas of December. Of C. Sempronius Atratianus Consul, Valerius writeth six book, exp. 5, whom he forenameth Lucius: but in the third book and second chapter, he speaketh of both, although antically; for Q. Fabius, he nameth Q. Capuaus.

L. Mauilius Capitolinus.
Q. Annius Merenda.
Tribuns military in
L. Papius Magullanus.
Consuls authority.
L. Servilius Sturillus.

The Senate being offended with the very name of Consuls for the hatred they bare to Sempronius, commanded Tribuns military to be created with Consuls authority. And where they were, L. Mauilius Capitolinus, Q. Annius Merenda, and Papius Magullanus. Thus much Livy, in whose story the name is mistaking, to wit, L. Servilius Sturillus, who in the year 337, is found engraved in the Capitol stones. Tribuns military, the second time; Of these, Diodorus saith not a word. In a fragment of the Capitoline marble, there is to be seen the surnames of Magullanus, belonging to L. Popius.

T. Quintius Capitolinus, N. Fabius Vabicilus.

N ot only Livy, but Cassiodorus also recordeth that the Consul this year were M. Fabius Vib- cilus and T. Quintus Capitolinus. Diodorus overpaith them; but do not the Sicilian regifterers in a fragment of the Capitol marble, we find engraven T. Quintus Capitolinus Barbatus and N. Fabius. This Fabius was the son of Q. Fabius the Decemvir, who after the 300 Fabius slain in Cremona, liveth, and was the first of all that kindred and family surnamed Fa-bius: as Valerius Maximi in his 30 book, and Sex. Pompeius do report. As for T. Quintius for he was (as Livy writeth) to that Capitolinus who was Consul six times.

An Interregency.

When the greater part of the year was spent in troubles and contentions, between the new Trib., of the Commons and certain Interregents, while the Tribuns one while would not suffer the Patritii to go together about the declaring of an interregent, and another while impeached the Interregent that he could not pass an act of the Senate for the election of Consuls as length L. Papius Magullanus the interregent, by rebuking as well the Senators as the Tribunes of the Commons, prevailed, that an assembly should be held for choosing of Tribuns confiner, so there were created Tribuns military with Consuls authority, and all Patritii, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, L. Sempronius Atratianus, Thus much Livy.

A. Menenius Lanatus.
P. Lurcriius Tricipitinus.
Trib. military in Consuls authority.
C. Servilius.

Military Tribuns with Consuls authority for this year, are let down by Livy Agrippa, Menenius Lanatus, P. Lurcriius Tricipitinus, and P. Numia: for the name of the fourth wanting; and that was C. Servilius, son of Quintius and nephew of Catius, surnamed Axil-los; who the year following, in the Capitol tables is numbered among the Tribuns confiner, with the numeral note of II. So ass it must needs be, that he was the first time in the year, for as much as no other fit void place left for him. Diodorus nameth Sp. Vetulius.
The Chronicle

L. Sergius Fides, M. Papirius Amigillanus, C. Servilius Priscus

For Tribunes Consular this year, Liuv names the. This C. Servilius is by Verres Placent named Axilla. Diodorus calleth them L. Sergius, M. Servilius, and M. Papirius. Now this M. Papirius was son to L. Papirius Magillanus the Centor.

Only these are by Liuv recorded: but that the pen-men who wrote out the books, left out the fourth Tribune of this year Quintus Fabius, son of Quintus, nephew of Marcus, named also Pibiulm). The Capitoline stones and Diodorus do tell the same name. Liuv himself doth also write this name, who writeth that Quumius Fabius was Tribune military the second time, in the year three hundred and forty; but in what year he was first, it appears not. Moreover, Agrippa is by Verres Placent named the son of Lucius and nephew of Aulus. Diodorus recketh all four, but he conceal the names.

P. Cornelius Cossio, Q. Cincinnatus, C. Valerius Potius, N. Fabius Vibilius.

He doth Liuv deliver unto us for Tribunes military this year: Diodorus, Titus Pestiunimus, Cn. Cornelius, C. Valerius, and Cn. Fabius. But Verres Flacent nameth P. Pestiunimus son of A. nephew of Aulus; whom Liuv writeth to have been

Tribunes militari

Cn. Cornelius Cossio, C. Fabius Medullinus.

Then the Noble and LL. of the Senate imported, that there should be Consuls created in the Centurial assembly, which Q. Fabius held. And the Consuls were M. Cornelius Cossio, and L. Fabius Medullinus. The name are named by Diodorus, and Caffector, but that they leave out their names. The Greek records have Cossio, and Medullinus.

Q. Fabius Ambustius, C. Fabius Pusillus.

Liuv and Caffector name these for Consuls Diodorus, supplupeth their names.

M. Papirius, C. Numilius Rufius.

Both Liuv and Caffector report for this year Consuls, M. Papirius and C. Numilius Rufius. Diodorus hath not a word of the names. Caffector book letteth them down by the names only Magillanus and Rufius.

M. Amylius, C. Valerius.

Liuv and Caffector call them Consuls, C. Amylius and C. Valerius. Diodorus in the list of M. hath M. i., Manus, this Amylius in the table of the Capitol, named in his first and third Tribunship, M. Amylius, son of Manus, nephew of M., and surname Manusius.

Cn. Cornelius Cossio, L. Fabius Medullinus.

Liuv putteth these down for the Consuls of this year. Caffector putteth over their names and the numeral note of two. Diodorus hath L. Fabius and Ca. Pompeius; but he is to be written Cn. Cornelius, out of the end of a broken fragment in the Capitol; and the other L. Fabius, by his Tribunship testify'd in the Capitol records.

C. Iulius Julius, P. Cornelius Cossio, Cn. Valerius Abala.

These are let down for Tribunes military this year by T. Livius. Diodorus saith nothing of their names, which the Capitol tables exhibit unto us. Cn. Servilius is written in the second Tribunship (after the Capitol records) the son of Pubiis, and nephew of Q. furnamed Abala.

Cn. Cornelius Cossio, L. Valerius Potius, Q. Fabius Vibilius, M. Pestiunimus Regicentius.

Thee declareth Livius; for this year, but Diodorus, Titus Pestiunimus, Cn. Cornelius, C. Valerius, and Cn. Fabius. But Verres Flacent nameth P. Pestiunimus son of A. nephew also of Aulus; whom Liuv writeth to have been Lyre, recollect, that the four Tribunes con- ulilar were all Patruii this year, & had boen that dignity once before, to wit, L. Varus Medul- linius, C, Valerius Postius, N. Fabius Vibulianus, and C. Servilius Abala; and then this man last named was chosen again and continued in his place till this year with the former, as well in regard of other virtues as for the fresh favour and late grace gotten by his singular moderation and rare carriage in his government. Diodor- rarch C. Furtus C. Servilius C. Valerius, and N. Fabius. In the Capitoline tables, two are written short, Postivius Volusius III and Medullinius, the other two as full, whereby it doth appear as Omyphus reporteth, that Lys was deceived. For Medullinius was not this year Tribune the second time, but the first: who had been twice Consul before, and after this year, will be no less than seven times Tribune militiary.

L. Cornelia Cossus, N. Fabius Ambassius, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Postius.
Of these four Tribunes military, I. Valerius Postius and N. Fabius Ambassius stand upon record in the Capitol tables; the other two, as appeareth by a fragment thereof, by I. Loy- alo and Cestius, were Pub. Cornelius, son of Amilus, nephew of M. Ruckius Cossus, to written by his dictation. Diodorus reckoneth Ten- tus Maximus for the fourth Tribune.

Diodorus, faith, that this year six Tribunes were created, but he nameth but three, T. Quinctius Cetubianus, C. Iulius, and An. Man-lius, I. Loy reheareth them all as here they be let down. The Capitoline stone LII, I. Co- pilinius Barbatus, Cestius, and the other three. And this was the first year that had six Tribunes military, notwithstanding that the law permitted it before, at what time as full it was granted that Tribunes should be created; and in this year began the siege first before Feii.

I. Loy recketh all these Tribunes this year, L. Diodorus puteth down Lm. Iulius, M. Furius, Amyntius Mamercus, Camu Cetubianus, C. Fabius Malagostus, but amisse. In the frag- ments of the Capitol, they are thus named, La- Iius Iulius, A. Malus, nephew of P. Poplius Iurnalle Iulius, Marcus Amyntius, I. Iulius, nephew of M. Furtus, nephew of Marcus Amyntius, I. Iulius, nephew of Marcus, nephew of L. Iulius, nephew of Qu. Ambassius the second time. These were commanded to enter into government upon the first day of October (whereas the thirteenth of December was the usual day before time). I. Loy recketh of an overthrow received the former year at Feii by M. Sergius. Camus made an expedition in the Silkian country, Cornelius to the Capeans, Varus to the Volscians for the recovery of Anxuni, Amynti- us and Fabius to besiege Feii.

I. Loy writeth that the number of Tribunes militiary were by the Romans augmented, and eight of them created, which were more then ever any time before, whose names we have let down. In Diodorus they are thus named, Marcus Claudius, Mar. Quinctius, Lm. Iulius, M. Furtus, L. Iulius. And albeit there be wanting in some Tribunes, yet Omyphus thinketh, and doth Sigoth, that himself by his own delivereth not eight, but fix; which Vero- rius Flaccus also observeth in the Capitoline tab- bles.

C. Servilius Abala, III, Q. Sulpicius, Q. Servilius, A. Malus, L. Virginus, M. Sergius, II.
IN Lys the Tribunes militiary in Consul authorities are C, Servilius Abala the third time Quin. Servilius, and Lm. Virginus the rest as in the tables of the Capitol, but only the fore- names. Lys nameth Qu. Servilius, Fidusianus in the other six Tribunships following, which he shall bear, To Lm. Virginus, Omyphus ad- deth Truscitus, a surname usually in that house. Diodorus saitheth not out of this range, but as Sigoth noteth, he doth rank in the name, and doth not reckon. In the fragments of the Capito- tol, they are thus named, Q. Servilius the Jon of Servilius, N. Cestius Cetubianus, An. Malus, toot Amilus, nephew of C. Volo Capito- linius; the second time, M. Sergius son of Lucius nephew of Lucius, named Fidusianus, the se- cond time.

I. Loy reckoneth all these Tribunes this year, L. Diodorus puteth down Lm. Iulius, M. Furi- us, Amyntius Mamercus, Camu Cetubianus, C. Fabius Malagostus, but amisse. In the frag- ments of the Capitol, they are thus named, La- Iius Iulius, A. Malus, nephew of P. Poplius Iurnalle Iulius, Marcus Amyntius, I. Iulius, nephew of M. Furtus, nephew of Marcus, nephew of L. Iulius, nephew of Qu. Ambassius the second time. These were commanded to enter into government upon the first day of October (whereas the thirteenth of December was the usual day before time). I. Loy reckoneth of an overthrow received the former year at Feii by M. Sergius. Camus made an expedition in the Silkian country, Cornelius to the Capeans, Varus to the Volscians for the recovery of Anxuni, Amynti- us and Fabius to besiege Feii.
The Chronologie

Hele by T. Livius are this year named the Tribunes military. But Didoros reheareth only three, namely, P. Melius, Sp. Mamini, and L. Furins. But Oomphrus thinketh that he is to be read, not L. Furins but Sp. Furins. The same author hath putt to P. Licinius the surname of Calvis, whom Livy writeth to have been the first man of the commonalty chosen Tribune military, only to take possession of the said right and interest.

The Didoros neweth for Tribunes. But Livy leteth down Marcus Furius to have been the only Patrini, and the rest commoners, namely, M. Pomponini, C. Dainius, Volero Publilinius, Cn. Gennius, L. Aetilus, Castrinius: his book, who every year delivereth the names only of two Tribunes, hath Augustus and Longus, the names of Gennius & Aetilus.

Ali these Tribunes military for this year created were Patrilli, as Livy writeth: neither differeth Didoros although he recite two names corruptly, to wit, Macaod Cynis, Agiades Cynis. Plutarch in the life of Camillus maketh mention, of the said Camillus, the second time Tribune military; and the Capitoline Stone of Medullins the third time.

In this maner are these Tribunes military delivered unto by Livy. But Didoros names them thus, L. Titinius, P. Licinius, L. Medius, Q. Mamini, Cn. Gennius, and L. Aetilus. All these, but L. Licinius the son of Publius as Livy giveth the dignity of Tribune ship a little before, whereunto moreover, that Gennius was slain in a battle against the Faliscins.
T

The Heze are by Tepelln records for Tribunes military in Consuls authority: but Diodorus recketh the three Fabius, Q, K, & C, and the other three, besides Plutarch in Coinnulis, Gelius out of Ferrus Flaccus, in his 5 book and 17 chapter: Macrobius also in his first book of Saturnals, make report of Quintus Sulpicius a Tribune military.

A

According to Livy, there were created Tribunes military after the winning of the City: but by Diodorus, they were Pub, Cornelius, L. Virginius, A. Manlius, and L. Polsumius. Off these Tribunes,Macrobius speaketh in his first book of Saturnals.

Livy hath Tepelln but Diodorus faith, that four only were created namely, L. Papirius, Q, T, and L. Lull Quinutil. But of those six, A. Manlius having been Tribune military in the year 365, and who shall be a third time in the year 371, must now verily be the second one.

Livy Tribunes military in Coull, authority, in this manner be delivered unto us by Lep: but Diodorus (as his manner is) putteth down four Ser, Sulpicius, L. Papirius, Mar. Cornelius, and T. Quintini. In this year, M. Manlius attained and condemned for aliping to be K, was thrown down headlong from the rock Tarpeia: Live, Plutarch, and Vater.

L. Valerius IV. L. Lucretius.

Livy rangeth the six this year, Diodorus nameth four; L. Valerius, Grifius, (which is the name of Tribunon) Am, Madius, and Ser, Sulpicius, Grifius, some call Flavius.

According to Livy, there were created Tribunes military in Consuls authority. The surname of Cornelius (as we saw before) was Malgigninos, Diodorus writeth four; Q, Servilius, S, Papirius, Cornelius, & Fabius, but not truly.

Livy nameth these as we have placed them: but Diodorus in this wise: M, and L both Furius, A. Pofhimius L. Lucretius, M. Fabius, and L. Pofhimius Plutarch also nameth Cumlus Tribune military this year; wherein he vanquished the Preelins, the Volcians, and the Tuculans also, against whom was proclaimed, because they had levied in the field under the Preelins.

After this, was the general assembly held for the election of military Tribunes in Consular authority, wherein were as many created of the Commoners as of the Patricians; namely, P. and C. both Males, with L. Julius, Patricians; and of the Commons, C. Sextius, M. Albinius, and L. Antistius. But Diodorus exhibits eight, and to those above rehearsed, he addeth C. Heculius, and P. Trebonius. Sextius also he calleth Sextius.

I

Livy reporteth these for Tribunes military in Consular authority: this, but in Livy, for L. Mucinius the third time, you must read C. Licinius, as Sigerinus hath declared in his Schedula upon Livy: which Onuphrius also in his Calendar approveth. But Diodorus speaketh of no more than four: Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, L. Furius, P. Cladius.

When C. Licinius and L. Sextius the Tribunes gave over their opposition and the liberty of their negative voice, whereby the Interegent called and held an assembly for the election of Magistrates, the abovesaid Tribunes military, were (as Livy faith) created for this year, Diodorus nameth them thus, L. Papirius, L. Mucinius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpius, whom Livy calleth Sextius, that after them there was another Anarchy, and when that was overpast and gone then were created A. Manlius, L. Furius, Ser. Sulpius, and Ser. Cornelius. But in his story, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied our fame, there is a confusion of yearly Magistrates.

This year also, as Livy writeth, had there for Tribunes military in Consular authority, but Diodorus hath Q. Servilius, Q. Vulcius, A. Cornelius, M. Cornelius, and M. Fabius as for Quintius, Sigerinus calleth him rather Cincinnatus than Capitolinus. The rest have their warrant out of the Capitoline fragments, wherein it is thus found: "M. Maluginensis. Cincinnatus. M. Fabius Ambusius. This is that M. Fabius Ambusius, who had beleaved his two daughters in marriage, the one to C. Licinius Sto., the other to Ser. Sulpicius Protectans, as Livy writeth.
Livy declared these six for Tribunes military this year, Diadorus rehearsed but these, namely, T. Quinctius, Servius Cornelius, and Servius Sulpicius. What surnames all these carried, and with what numeral notes (signifying how often they had been the office) they are to be marked, the Capitoline fragments do shew; wherein they fland thus, Capitolium, &c.

Two Dictators without any enure Magistrates of State before.

Recently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the trial of a final issue, what should become of the forenamed laws proposed by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribunes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindered by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between; the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all haste betook them to their two left helps and means of refuge, the sovereign and absolute government and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man; who took unto him for General of the horsemen L. Aemilius. But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus, he (as Livy writeth) rejoined up his Dictatorship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who likewise avouched the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Livy and Plutarch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a second Dictator created. Livy saith, it was P. Maelius, Plutarch appreth his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the General of the horse. Howbeit, they mean not both, one and the self-same man. For Livy faith and that truly, that it was he who had been Tribune military in Consuls authority before: but Plutarch nameth him, who was the author of the sedition, and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth. For the Captain of the forenamed sedition, was this year also made Tribune of the Com. the ninth time: but Tribune of the Com. and General of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Quinctius thinketh him to have been the son of P. Licinius Calvis military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub. Licinius, who of the Com. was the first Tribune military. Of this, see more in his Kalender.
together with L.Geminus, but in the second, the son of M.nephew of Cn.furname Amenienius. In the Sicilian regis ters they be written Geminus and Curtius, but corruptly, as Sige nius thinketh.

C.Sulpitius Petenius, C.Licinins Stole.

Here be the Consuls reported by Livy and Diodorus, Diodorus conceal their surnames, Valerius Max. in his second book and first chapter mention of them, and doeth Plutarch in his problems, But he whom all other writers name Stole, the Capitoline records nomine Calvus: as also the Sicilian which deliver their surnames Petenius and Calvus.

L.Amylius Manueriuu II. Cn. Genimus.

Livy and Diodorus declare these for Consuls: whom Diodorus in his sixteenth book nameath Cn. Genimus and L. Amylius. In the Capitol tables in this manner be set down, * * * Marucerius II. and Cn. Genimus son of M. and nephew of M. Amenienius. But in the Sicilian registers, Manocerius and Calvus.

Q.Seruulius Abola II. L.Genimus II.

Diodorus nameath the Consuls of this year, Q. Servulus and Q. Genimus. The Sicilian register, Abola and Genimus. Livy and Cassiodorus, Q. Servulus Hola and L. Genimus. These are they who three years before were matched together in the same government.

C.Sulpitius, C.Licinins Calvus.

Here be by Livy recorded Consuls this year, Cassiodorus write them thus, C.Sulpitius II. and C. Licinius, Diodorus in this wife, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius, Sige nius suppose they be the same, who three years before were Col leagues. The Sicilian registar give unto Licinius the surname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stole: and Sulpitius say they surname Petenius.

C.Patitius Libo, M. Fabius Ambusbus.

Livy and Cassiodorus write the Consuls for this year were, C. Patitius Balbus: and M. Fabius Ambusbus. But Diodorus, M. Fabius, and C. Patitius, corruptly for Patitius. The Capitoline writers give them surnames divers from Livy; for they call Libo, Balbus: but he, Balbus. And the Sicilian register go with those of the Capitol.

M.Popilius Lauus, Cn. Manlius.

Livy and Cassiodorus name this year Consuls in this form: but Diodorus call them, M. Popilius Laurus, and Cn. Manlius Imperiosus, This was the first man of the Popilii, furname Lauus. The reason of which name Ciceron rendeth in his book Brutus, saying, M. Popilius being Consul, and at the same time offering sacrifice in his robe called Lauus, for that he was Flamin to Carmenta, upon news brought unto him that the commons were up and rife in a commotion against the Nobles, came in that attire and habit as he was into the assembly: and what with his authority of censure, and what with his eloquence of speech, appeased the sedition.

C.Fabius, C. Plantius.

Livy and Cassiodorus have these above-named for the Consuls this year: but in Diodorus, they are named M. Fabius and C. Plautius. In the Capito line records, * * * Amlbsbus and C. Plautius Proculus.

C.Martins, Cn. Manlius.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus name the Consuls of this year, C. Martius and Cn. Manlius. This Cn. Manlius was Consul the first time, two years before, Cipstiianus book and the Greek records have Rutilius and Capito lineus.

M.Fabius Ambusbus II. M.Popilius Lauus II.

This year Consuls are with these names entitled by Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames and the numerall notes, Cipstianus book and the Greek records, set them thus down. Ambusbus II. and sayth,

C.Sulpitius Petenius III, M.Valerius Poplicola.

In the four hundred year from the foundation of the City, and the thirty five after that it was by the Gauls won, the commons after eleven years did forgo their hold of the Confulship, and upon an Interegency, both Cof, of the Patricii enired into government, to wit, C. Sulpitius Petenius III., M. Valerius Poplicola, as Livy faith, The same Consuls Diodorus, Cassiodorus, and the Sicilian registar do report, But why the account of time made by Livy, disagreeeth from this reckoning, Sige nius and Onuphis in his Kalender do give a reason.

M.Fab, Ambusbus III. T. Quint, or M. Popilius.

In this year also, according to Livy, both Cof, were Petenius, namely, M. Fabius Ambusbus the third time, with T. Quintius, although they writeth, that in one Annal instead of T. Quin tius, he found Marcus Popilius Consul. With Livy accordeth Diodorus, and Cassiodorus, Sexinis also, who in his forty one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos writeth, that Alexander was born when M. Fabius Ambusbus and T. Quin-
The Confuls were named by Livy and Caforfodors. Some put to Quintus the name Caesar, others Cnay, and Caforfodor name them thus, C. Sulpius Peticus and T. Quintus Pennus, but Diodorus C. Sulpius and C. Quintus.

M. Valerius Corvinus II. C. Petreius.

T. Manlius Torquatus, C. Plutarchus.

M. Valerius Corbinus, M. Popilius Lanus, III.

Arcus Manlius torquatus being Dictator, declared for Conful with the exceeding favour of the people, M. Valerius corvinus for that was his surname afterwards in his absence, and being but three and twenty years old. This corvinus had joined him in the Confulship from out of the commons, M. Popilius Lanus the third time, as faith Livy and Caforfodor. But Diodorus three years after nomineth M. Valerius and M. Popilius. In the fragment of the Capitoll thus only it is found, M. Valerius, M. F. M. N. Corvinus Conful. In the Sicilian regiters Corvinus and Lanus.

C. Sulpius Peticus, III. M. Valerius, Poplicola III.

Both Confuls created this year were Patrici, and namely, those who are here set down after Livy and Caforfodorus, Diodorus omiteth both their surnames, and also the numeral notes, and fetteth after the former Confuls, M. Valerius and C. Sulpius.

P. Valerius Poplicola, C. Martius Rutius.

To L. Valerius Poplicola was given in fellowship of government this year, C. Martius Rutius of the commons, as Livy faith, Thefe Caforfodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius Rutius the second time, Diodorus nameth them M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian regiters intername them confeduly with those of the next year, matching Rutius and Pennus together.

M. Popilius Lanus, L. Cornelius Scipio.

Livy writeth, that for Confuls this year the commons yielded M. Popilius Lanus, and the nobles L. Cornelius Scipio. Caforfodor seteth them forth under the name of M. Popilius Lanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Scipio, Diodorus nameth them, C. Cornelius and M. Popilius; and the Sicilian regiters barely Scipio and Lanus.

L. Furius Camillus, P. Claudius Crassus.

Lucius Furius Camillus the Dictator restored the nobles again to their former possessiof the Confulship: and being himself for that good demerit created Conful, with the great love and hearty affection of the nobles, nominated for his College, Publius Claudius Crassus. Thus faith Livy. The same Confuls are let down by caforfodor. But Diodorus nameth them Emylius and T. Quintius, The Sicilian regiters, Camillius and Crassus. Gicero in Cato make mention of these Confuls, saying, that Plata came to Tarcentum, when L. Camillius and P. Crassus were Confuls: Galatin likewise, book 11 chapter.

M. Valerius Corvinus, M. Popilius Lanus, III.

M. Valerius Corvinus III. A. Cornelius Cicerus.

Livy and Caforfodor both together report, that these were chosen Conful, for this year. Diodorus, Cicero in his book of Divination, and Frontinus name them, M. Valerius and A. Cornelius. The Sicilian regiters, Valerius and Coflus; both of them are Patrici. But he that hath written of famous men, calleth them Valerius Max, and Cornelius Coflus.
C. Martius Rutilus IV. Q. Servilius.

usty and Caffiodorus declare Coff, for this year, C. Martius and Q. Servilius, Diodorus, Q. Servilius and Martius Rutilus. The Sicilian regifters, Abala and Rutilus. This is that Q. Servilius Abala, who was Master of the horse in the 403 year.

C. Plutinus II. L. Anylus Mamerciunus.

The Consuls that followed were C. Plutinus the second time, and L. Anylus Mamerciunus, witnesses Lucy and Caffiodorus: but L. Rutilus and C. Plutinus as tellith Diodorus and as the Sicilian regifters say, Vero and Mamerciunus, Cenfpianni calendar set forth for this year, being the second time, and Mamerciunus.

T, Manlius Torquatus III. P. Decius Mus.

This Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus, bare the Consuls this year, as Lucy and Caffiodorus report, Diodorus nameth them, T. Manlius Torquatus and P. Decius, The Sicilian regifters, Torquatus and Mus, Zonaras, Torquatus the third time, and Decius. Of the same Consuls Pliny speaketh in his 20 book and 5 chap, Valerius also in his 1 book and 5 chap, besides others.

T, Anylus Mamerciunus. Q. Publilius Philo.

This Anylus Mamerciunus, and Q. Publilius Philo, are by Lucy reckoned Coff, for this year, Diodorus pasheth over their surnames, The Greek records shew unto us, Mamerciunus and Philo. As for Philo, he is described out of the tables of the Capitoll.

L. Furius Camillus. C. Manius.

Thus saith Lucy and Caffiodorus, Diodorus Hath L. Furius and Philo, but corruptly The Sicilian regifters, Camellius and Menius. The Capitol monuments of triumphs, L. Furius Camillus, and C. Menius, Pliny in his 34 book and 5 cha, maketh mention of Caes Menius, Consul; 1

Lucy and Caffiodorus write, that theie Coff, followed, Diodorus puttheth down C, Sulpius, and L. Papirius. The Sicilian regifters, have Longus and Pans.

L. Papirius Caffius. K. Dintius.

Lucius Papirius Caffius, and K. Dintius, were this years Coff, as witness Lucy, Caffiodorus, and Diodorus also, but for leaving out the surname Caffius. In the Sicilian regifters they are named, Caffius and Dintius. Atouching their Conulis, Cicero in his Epistle to Pans, wrieth thus, L. Papirius Caffius, four years after he was Dictator, was made Consul with X. Dintius.

M. Valerius Corvus IIII. M. Attillus Regulus.

This year, when the Amoones that inhabited the City Cales, took arms and combined with the Sicidins, M. Valerius Corvus, a right noble General, was created Consul the fourth time, having to his College (as Lucy wrieth) M. Attillus Regulus, Caffiodorus likewise declareth the frame for Consulis: and so deth Diodorus, but that he leaveth out their surnames: which appear extant in the Sicilian regifters.

He Dictator held an assembly for the election of Conulis, wherein were created according to Lucy the above-named. So say Caffiodorus also and Diodorus, Zonaras nameth them Tiber, Calvitius, and Sp. Posthinius: and right well, as Segonius thinketh: for Tiberius was the fore-name of the Vettius. The Greek records, and Caffiodinius book, have Albinius and Calvitius.

L. Corvius. C. Sulpicius.

Segonius and Ompirius invent this one year without Conulis: besides the account of the years, according to the Capilloni monuments, albeit they see neither in Lucy, nor many other, mention thereof; and all to make up the total sum collected by Varro. And that the said year should be this time especially be interpreted the tables of the Capitoline records do shew. For whereas in them thus engraven it is, M. Valerius Corvus Consul the fourth time in the year of the City 419, and again L. Emilus and C. Plutinus, in the year 414: to the end that these records might agree one with another, of necessi- tity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L. Emilus the Consul should fall upon the year 414, and the total sum of the year in Varro and the Capitoline tables be overthrown. That this odd-year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Halesander (who left in writing a Chronology of the Conulis) law long before them: for he over-paseth this year wholly, noted without Consulis. But Segonius and Ompirius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-wealth without Conulis, or other Magistrates of State, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Lucy wrieth.

A. Cornelius II. Cn. Domitius.

Attius Cornelius the second-time Consul, with Cn. Domitius, is by Lucy, and Caffius set down.
After this, were created Conuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Valerius.

These Conuls are by Livy and Cassiodorus put down for conuls, L. Papius Graffus, and P. Plantus Venus.

Cassiodorus put down for conuls, [for Conuls] L. Papius Graffus, P. Plantus Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula, Dio Cass. P. Corneliae, L. Cornelius Scapula, Diodorus, P. Cornelius Scapula, Dio Cass., P. Corneliae, A. Pashus, Livy, and Cassiodorus. The Sicilian regiments Veniso and Scipio, Ompurix, Livy, and Cassiodorus. The Sicilian regiments, Veniso and Scipio, Ompurix. As for Papius, Livy, indeed furnameth him here. Magillus, but he saith that he findeth him another Annals by the name of Confur. In the Greek records they be Lito and cerfor. Now, as touching C. Petullus, he is to be written with the numeral note II, and not III, as Siganus and Ompurius do admonish. For it is not the same man who was Conuls in the 393 years but his son.

Cassiodorus put down for conuls, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Junius Brutus Secau.

Heicus Furius, unto whom the charge of Samnium fall by lot, forsook, and by occasion of sickness to forgo the war there, and was commanded to nominate for the managing of martial affairs a Dictator whereupon he pronounced L. Papius Cerfor, the bravest warrior in those days; by whom Q. Fabius Rullianus was named great Master of the horse. Afterwards Cerfor turned him out of that Masterhip of horse, because without his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Samnites when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Aulpias a new and in his room he substituted L. Papius Graffus. Thus write Livy, Entropius, and Valerius; in the second book.

Q. Fabius, L. Fulvius.

Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Conuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius, whom the Capitol records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximum Rullianus, and I. Fulvius Q. Curtius. Marvell it is therefore, that in the Sicilian regiments they are put down, Curto and Sylver.

This year, Livy and Cassiodorus let loose for Conuls, T. Veturius, C. Deciusus, and Sp. Paehus, Livy, in his third book of Olives writeth that they were twice Conuls, Cenang and Cenali.
The Chronologie

L. Papyrius Cursor II. C. Publilus Philo.

Livy and Caffiodorus shew for this year Conuls, Q. Publilus Philo and L. Papyrius Cursor, the second time. The Sicilian regiters, Cursor and Philo. But that this Philo should now be third time Conul, his Conulships do plainly shew.

L. Papyrius Cursor or Magillius. Q. Anius Cerretanus II.

Livy faith, there is some doubt whether L. Papyrius Cursor were this year created Conul the third time, with Q. Anius Cerretanus the second time; and for his good service in war at Luceria continued still in government; or rather L. Papyrius Magillius, and so the surname was mistaken. Caffiodorus delievereth unto us L. Papyrius and Q. Anius Cerretanus. The Siciliano regiters, Papyrius and Cerretanus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitol, alloweth of Cursor and not Magillius. The author of that book which Caffiodorus hath set forth, following other Annals, setteth down Magillius.

M. Fesius Flaccinaior, L. Plantius Verno.

Seeing that for twelve years next ensuing, we have the Capitolion tables whole and found, the left trouble we need to be at in reforming and rectifying the names of the Magilirats. Both they, and also Livy with Caffiodorus represent unto us for this years conuls, M. Fesius Flaccinaior and L. Plantius Verno. Diocttrus calleth them L. Plietius and midas &c. &c. The Siciliano regiters, Verno and Flaccus.

Sp. Nauilus, M. Papius.

Next follow in order Sp. Nauilus and M. Papilus Conuls, according to Livy and Caffiodorus. Rustius and Lanus their surnames, are by Siginus refereed unto them; and the same also are to be leem in the Siciliano books of record.

L. Papyrius Cursor III. Q. Publilus Philo IIII.

The Conuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livies books, are there left out: namely, L. Papyrius Cursor the fourth time, and Q. Publilus Philo likewise the fourth time; as it is written in Caffiodorus, in the Capitol tables, and in Cipanimus book, wherein they are named Cursor and Philo. Howbeit, in the Siciliano regiters they are called Cursor and Lanus.

M. Patellius, C. Sulpitius.

Livy and Caffiodorus report for Conuls this year C. Sulpitius and M. Patellius. But Diodorus hath C. Sulpitius and midas &c. corruptly for torritas. The Capitolion writers, have M. Patellius Lito and C. Sulpitius Longus the third time. The Siciliano regiters, Longus and spurius, but there is a fault, as Siginus truly thinketh.

L. Papyrius Cursor V. C. Junius Babulius.

Diodorus putteth down for Conuls this year L. Papyrius fift time, and C. Junius. The Siciliano regiters, Cursor and Babulius. But Livy and Caffiodorus, L. Papyrius Cursor V. and C. Junius Babulius II. Festus maketh mention also of these Costin his 18 book.

M. Valerius, C. Decius.

Livy writeth that there followed consuls M. Valerius Max. and P. Decius: but Caffiodorus, saith M. Valerius and P. Decius. Frontinus in his book of water-conduis, speaketh of these Conuls; whom he writeth to have been thirty years after the beginning of the Samnit war. As for P. Decius, Livy afterwards calleth Mus. The Siciliano regiters have Max. and Mus.

C. Junius Babulius III. Q. Emilius Barbula II.

We find in Livy for Consuls this year, C. Junius Babulius the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second time: likewise in Caffiodorus. But Diodorus numbereth them C. Junius and Q. Emilius. In the Siciliano regiters, Babulius and Barbula. The fame names are also in the Capitolion monuments, which be in Livy.

C. Martinus Rustius, Q. Fabius.

Cassius Martinus Rustius and Q. Fabius be this years Consuls in Livy, But in Caffiodorus, C. Martinus Rustius and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus hath C. Martinus and Q. Fabius the second time. The Siciliano regiters shew Rustius and and Rutulus. The Capitol monuments, Q. Fabius, Max., Rutillus the second time, and C. Martius, who afterwards in his second Conscrip-ship in the 498th year, is surnamed Consorius.

A year without Consuls, P. Papirius Dictator, II.

Verrua Flaccus interpofeth this year also without Consul, wherein he reporteth L. Papirius Dictator the 2 time, with C. Junius Brutus the Master of the horie. This year Dioodorus, Livy, the Greek records, Caffinian book and Caffiodor do overtop. For Livey writeth that L. Papirius Cæsor was nominated by the consuls Dictator, and by him C. Junius Brutus named Master of the horie: upon occasion that C. Martius the Col, had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnium. This inseriting of one year Onomphius hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Livius might stand in force, to the Capitol tables putreth one year, where judgment we also are willing to follow.

Q. Fabricius, P. Decius.

Livy writeth, that Fabricius continued Consul this year also, for his singular good service in dubious and taming Hevemania and that he had for his companion in government Decius, Caffiodorus acknowledgeth for Col, Q. Fabricius the third time, and P. Decius the second time, Dioodorus, P. Decius and Q. Fabricius, the Sicilian regillers Mab and Rutillus, The Capitoline tables, P. Decius Mab ins. and Q. Fabricius Mab, Rutillus the third time.

App. Claudius, L. Volumnius.

Livy faith, that immediately there followed consuls, App. Claudius and L. Volumnius, Caffiodorus and Dioodorus, Appius and Volturnus, the Sicilian regillers, App. Claudius Cæsarius and L. Volumnius. The Capitoline monuments have Flaminius and Volturnus. Now whether one of these Consuls surnames be Volturnus or Volturnus, Onuphrius adviseth us to consider, For the capitol fhone hath it alwayes written Volturnus, But the Greek words have Apps and biaxor as if the name were Volturnus.

448
Q. Martius Tremulus, P. Cornelius Arvius.

Livy and Caffiodorus regillers for the Consuls of this year, Q. Martius Tremulus with a Colleague adjoynd unto him, Dioodorus faith Q. Martius and P. Cornelius, The Sicilian records, Tremulus and Arvius.

L. Pofthuminus, T. Mutilius.

Livy Pofthuminus and T. Mutilius are reported consuls by Dioodorus, Livy and Caffiod, cussianian book sheweth, Megellus and Angi- rius, Thalic Coin, both L. Pofthuminus put down for to succeed Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving one that two years wherein we have set down (as Livy writeth) that Claudius with Volturnus, and Cornelius with Martius were consuls. Whether his memory failed him in digesting of the annals, or of purpose he supposed that those two couple of Consuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overleapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline stone, which sheweth for this year, Megellus to be the surname of Pofthuminus, Tiberius the forename of Minutius, and M. of Fabius. Now the surnames of Fabius were Murius and Petenus, as it appear thereby in his triumph.

P. Sempronius Sophus. P. Sulpitius Serrurrius.

The Consuls next following were P. Sulpitius Serrurrius and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Livy and Caffiodorus. In Dioodorus they are written P. Sulpitius and P. Sempronius. In the Greek regilgers, they stand Sempronius and Savurrius. P. Caffiodorus writeth that these Consuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus, Both of them are describ'd thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitol, for in their Conscripship there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Publius.

Dioodorus, Livy and Caffiodorus report for Consul this year, L. Genuius, and Servius Cornelius, The Sicilian regillers have Ascanianus and Lemulius, The Capitoline writers put unto Con-fulus the surname of Lemulius.

M. Livius Denter, M. Aemylius.

Livy nameth for Consul this year M. Livius and c. Aemylius, caffiodorus, M. Livius and L. Aemylius, Dioodorus, M. Livius and M. Aemylius. As for the forename to Aemylus, Segonius and Omphrins do think that more credit is given unto Dioodorus, than others: especially, seeing that in Livy there is mention made the year following of M. Aemylus Puntus General of the horfemen, whom they all think to be the fame man that this Consul, M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitol records, which surname Livius in another place addeth to the Livius, caffiodorus book in like manner setteth down Denter and Puntus as the surnames of these Consuls. The Sicilian regillers, Denter and Aemylus.

Two Dictators, and no Consul.

This year also of two Dictators without Consuls, Omphrins intereth in his Kalender, howbeit directed thereto by evidence of the Capitol fragments: to end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects which;
which, if this year were over-flipped should be wholly overthrown: although Diodore, Livy, and Caesiodore differ therefrom, and leave out this year altogether. Whereof see Onomophris more at large in his Kalender upon this year 453.

M. Valerius, Q. Apuleius Panza.

Immediately after M. Livius and M. Asellius, Livy, and Caesiodore lettereth pase the year of two Dictators without Consuls, bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius Pandora for Consuls. The Greek records shew Goravus and Panza. It seemeth that Livy by M. Valerius meaneth Maximus; for that he faith that presently upon his Dictatorship he was made CoL Now that M. Valerius Max. was Dictator the year before, he writeth plainly.

M. Fulvius Patni, T. Marus Torquatus.

Livy and Caesiodore declare for Consuls this year, M. Fulvius Patni and T. Marus Torquatus. The Sicilian registors have Patnius and Torquatus, Livy faith that Q. Fabius refused the Consulship offered unto him without any hint of his. But T. Marus the Consul, was by lot appointed to levy war against Heron. whih took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entred into the enemies confines, but as he exercized among men of arms, and chance to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was cut from his back: whereupon (for the present) he lay for dead and within three days after the said fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius CoL whom the Senate purposed to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Max., in his 7 book and 48 chap, to have been Col. now the 48 time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years. although Platarch in the life of C. Marcius. they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvus and not Corvus.

C. Cornelius Scripius, Cn. Fulvius.

Crescens Fulvius and C. Cornelius Scripius recorded Consuls by Livy and Caesiodore; but Scripius and Centumalius, by Cappinianus book: Seipio and Maximus by the Greek records.

Q. Fabius Max. IV. P. Decius Mus III.

Livy and Caesiodore allledge for CoL this year, Q. Fabius Max IV the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus III. three times Col. Cappinianus book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frustianus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius three Col.

Q. Fabius Gorge Max. Decius Junius Brutus, son of Sicelani.

The yeare following had Consuls, Q. Fabius Gorges, and D. Junius Brutus Sicelani as witnesses. Livy and Caesiodore, Zonaras name them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max. Cappianins Kalender, Maximus and Scripius. The Sicilian registors, Brutus and Maximus, Livy, Pliny in his 7 book, the Capitol tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the son of Q. Max. Rutilianus, who had been 5 times CoL before. And here an end of the Consuls for the 5th 10 years.
Since that after this Conspic ship, ten books of Liwy next ensuing be lost, whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this story, so as now we are in manner defliute and deprieved of the best helps of Annals, namely, Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livy: from hence forward we will tic principally in digesting and reckoning the years by the Conulses, the authority and testimonies of Caifodorius, the Sicilian records, and Cappitiniian book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help sooner shall be minutely owned up to others. For this year therefore Caifodorius writeth, that L. Polli-nius and C. Junius, were created Con. whose fur-names Megellus, and Brutus Babuleus, have not been left out to much as in Caifiniian Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Liwy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, saying thus, Lu. Polliiius Megellus the Intergent, was created Con., with C. Babuleus, by that very court and assembly which himself called and held,

He Con., this year are recorded by Caifodo-rius, Pub. Caifiniian Rufius, and M. Curius Dentatus for whom in the Sicilian registra, appear Maximus the third time and Mus the first time. But of those forenamed Con., Cicero mak-eth mention in his book, entitled Cato; Par-teculi in his first book, Valerius Mal, in his six book, and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M. Curius was called Dentatus as Pliny writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap, for that he came into the world with teeth,

M. Valerius. Q. Cadinini.

Caifodorius intereth P. Corn., Dolabella, and
Q. Cadinini for Con., Caifiniian Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvinus. The Sicilian regis-trers, Dolabella Maximus, And some think that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which he feemeth to have acquired by the honour
that he had won in the war against the Gauls,

Q. Martinus. P. Cornelius.

Caifodorius this year delivereth for Conilis,
Q. Martinus and P. Cornelius, Caifiniian book and the Greek records add their surnames, Tresneius II. and Avrionis II. who had been Conilis together once before;

Caifodorius avoucheth Conulcs this year,
M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautilus, The Greek records and Caifiniian book, have Marcellus and Nautilus.

M. Valerius. C. Aelius.

Arven Valerius and C. Aelius are ranged in this year for Con. by Caifodorius, Caifniian book putteith forth, Maximus and Mus:
but the Greek records, Patruus and Patruus.
Now you must think, that both Maximus and Patruus are the surnames of the Valerii,

C. Claudius, M. Aemilius.

Or this years Con., Caifodorius hath C. Claudinus and M. Aemilius. The Greek records and Caifiniian book, Cawon & Lepidus: whereof the former is the surname of Claudius, the latter of Aemilius.

C. Servilius, L. Caelius.

By Caifodorius, C. Servilius and L. Caelius Metellus are placed Con., in this year: for whereas in some copies of Caifodorius instead of Lu. Caifius is written Caifius that is a fault as Sagonius and Omporinhus have noted. To Servilius this Conul, the Greek records add the surname of Tarsus, whom they put down Con.
with Dempo, they would say Denter, as both Sagonius and Omporinhus suppose, For Denter is a turname also given to the Cælius, as appeareth by Liwy.

P. Cornelius Dolabella. Q. Domitius.

Caifodorius intereth P. Corn., Dolabella, and
Q. Domitius for Con., Caifiniian Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvinus. The Sicilian regis-
trers, Dolabella Maximus, And some think that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which
he feemeth to have acquired by the honour
that he had won in the war against the Gauls,

C. Fabriicus. Q. Aemilius.

Caifodorius bringeth in for Con., C. Fabriarius and Q. Aemilius: but the Sicilian regis-trers, Luscinus and Papir. Or them Cicero in his book Lcus, maketh mention in this manner:
We see that Papir Aemilius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscinus: for so we have heard our fathers say that they were two Con.
together, and companions in the censorship.
Moreover, Valerius in his chap. where he tre-tech of Poverty, maketh mention of C. Fabriarius, and Q. Aemilius Papir. This Bipir, Plu-tarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

L. Aemilius. Q. Martinus.

Here followed cozz as caifodorius sheweth, L. Aemilius & Q. Martinus: unto whom Caifiniian book and the Greek records give also their surnames, Bubus and Philippus, and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitol of their triumphs,
The Chronologie

474
P. Valerius, T. Coruncanius.

Puth Valerius and Tit. Coruncanius are by Caßfordor placed in this year for Cost, The Greek records, Cuniphorin book, Flow, Orosius, and Eutropius, give to Valerius the surname of Ldebani. And Plutarch hath elibor for Valerius.

P. Sulpitius, P. Decius.

Next after thofe, Caßfordor putrath down P. Sulpitius Conulf with P. Decius. The Sicilian regifters, have Sarmentius and Mus. Cicero in his book entitled De Fin, and in his Tufcanian diptaphie, faith, That this Pub. Decius was the elfon of that P. Decius who vowed himself to death in the Samnits and Gaulswar.

C. Fabricius, Q. Aemilius.

Caßfordor delivereth unto us for Conuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius whom Cuniphorin book and the Greek records, call Leftius in the second time, and Pupus. That these were fellows together once before in the Conulf, Cicero writheth in his book Lulitio, Plutarch in Pyrrius Cellius 3 book, chap. 8. Eutropius, and Zonarius make report of the fame.

477
P. Cornelius, C. Iunius.

Q. Fabius, C. Geminus.

Caßfordor reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Geminus Conuls. The Sicilian regifters have Gargus and Clephius. Of thefe Cost, Orosius maeth mention in this wife: When Fabius Gargus was the second time CoT, with C. Geminus Clephius, a grievous pestilence reigned both in the City, and also in the territory about it.

M'. Curius, L. Lentulus.

Caßfordor and Eutropius deliver unto us for Cost, M'. Curius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian regifters, Dentiatus and Lentulus. This is the third Conulf of M'. Curius, which together with Lentulus Conulfhip, is drawn out of the Capitoll records of triumph this year.

Serv. Cornelius, M'. Curius.

Caßfordor sheweth for this years Cost, Serv. Cornelius and M'. Curius, Cuniphorin book and the Greek records, Merenda and Dentsalis the third time, This M'. Curius is now Cost. the fourth time, for, thrice he was before. Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Merenda, Plutarch relateth and writheth, that he received a princeley coronet of gold at the hands of L. Lentulus the CoT of the former year, for winning a town of the Samnits.

C. Fabricius, C. Claudius.

Caßfordor setteth down, C. Fabricius and C. Claudius Conuls: the Sicilian records, Livius and Callin. Cuniphorin Kalender, Livius and Cun, Epitrobius, Pabius Liciinus and C. Claudius Callin. Veiius, Fabius Dorfo and Claudius Callin, Whereby it may be understood, that these Conuls were called, C. Fabius Dorfo Liciinus, and Cains Claudius Callin: for Dorfo was an old name of the Fabii.

Next after them, Caßfordor nominateth for Cost, Sp. Cornelius and L. Papirius Carbus. The records both of Sicily and Cuniphorin, have Carbus and Maximus. Both these were now Cost, the second time as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus speaketh of them in his book Of water-conduits, and L bevor his book 24.

C. Quintius, L. Gemitius.

This is reported by Caßfordor, that C. Quintius and L. Gemitius were Conuls, Cuniphorin book and the Greek records, set to their furnames, Claudius and Clephius. Livy in his 7 book speaketh of one Tit. Quintius lame of one leg, from whom haply this furname is drawn.

C. Geminus, Cn. Cornelius.

Reputed there are for Conuls this year by Caßfordor, C. Geminus and Cn. Cornelius: who furnames were Clephius and Blindo, as it appeareth in Cuniphorin book, This Cn. Geminus in the fame, who before-time was Conulf. As for C. Blindo, he is described by his Conulfhip standing upon record in the Capitoll. The Greek records over-pass them both.

Polybius and Cassiodorus match together in the Consular for this year L. Valerius and T. Oconius: the surname of Valerius is Valeri, and of Oconius, Caflorius, as it appearth upon the capitol and Sicilian records.

C. Agulius and Zonaris bring in for Cest., C. Agulius and C. Dutilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Jutius he had Polybius, The Sicilian Registers shew Scipio and Dutilius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio is surname also Asinus by the capital writers Cestius, Entropius, and Valerius in his first book chap. 10, of which surname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Asinus (quod, he) was given to the Cornelius for that the first of the Hoom Cornelius having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the common manner) he was required to put in good security for certainty, brought into the open market place a side laden with money, and pawned down that present in lieu of pledges.

Here are nominated by Cassiodorus for Conuls, C. Agulius and L. Cornelius, The Sicilian registrars, Flavus and Scipio, Zonaras, C. Flavus and L. Scipio, Entropius and Orosius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Agulius Flavus, Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Entropius and Orosius.

Polybius avoucheth for these years Conuls, A. Asilius and C. Sulpius. Cassiodorus, A. Asilius Calatinus, and C. Sulpius, The Sicilian registrars and Cassianus Kalender, Caflatius and Paternos. The capitol monuments, A. Asilius Calatinus and C. Sulpius Paternos, Zonaras, Asilius Calatinus, and Calvi Sulpius. Of these Conuls, Polybius, Cicero, Valerius, Flavus, Frontinus in his Strategems, Polybius and Calvisius make mention. But concerning the surname of Sulpius Paternus, the Capitoline tables disagree one from another; to wit, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that shew the Consulships and other magistracies; for in these latter monuments he is called Quintus, in the former, Caius, Whereby Gellius doth conjecture, that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Consular.

Cassiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius, and C. Asilius Serranus, for Conuls: but Polybius, C. Asilius. The capitol tables, C. Asilius Regulus, C. Cassianus Kalender and the Sicilian registrars, have Regulus and Blafo the second time, But how Asilius should come by his surname Serranus, Pliny sheweth in his 2 book, saying: In these days the fields were tilled by the very hands of L. Generals themselves, and a man verily would believe thereby, that the ground joyed in a laureat plough-share and a triumphant plowman. Him they found a lowering, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blafo, all authors well near besides, approve the judgment of Cassianus: but Gellius supposeth, that he was not the same man that was Conul before: and therefore he writeth him the son of C, nephew of L, without putting to the numerical note II.

Here are nominated by Cassiodorus for Conuls, C. Agulius and L. Cornelius, The Sicilian registers, Flavus and Scipio, Zonaras, C. Flavus and L. Scipio, Entropius and Orosius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Agulius Flavus, Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Entropius and Orosius.

A. Asilius Calatinus, Q. Sulpius.

The next Conuls that succeeded, were by (Cassiodorus his saying) Q. Cadius and L. Mantius, The Sicilian registers name them, Vulso and Cadius, Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Mantius, Entropius, M. Asilius Regulus and L. Mantius Vulso, and Polybius, M. Asilius and L. Mantius, Sulpicio in his 41 book maketh mention of these Conuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Cadius died whiles he was in office, and M. Asilius was substituted in his room, and made Conul the second time: as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, L. Mantius Vulso Longus: and in stead of Q. Cadius, M. Asilius Regulus the second time: as also by Cassianus book, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus.

Polybius sheweth for the Cest. this year, Ser., F ulpius and M. Asilius, Cassianus Kalender, Nolilis or and Pavlius, The Sicilian registrars, Paternos and Pavlius, Cassiodorus and Entropius, together with the Capitoline records have Ser., F ulpius Nobilior, and M. Asilius Pavlius.

Cn. Cornelius, A. Asilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius report for this year Conuls, Cn. Cornelius and A. Asilius, The capitol authors write, A. Asilius Calatinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Afranius like wife a second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Afranius twice Conul, thus writeth Valerius in his first book: Cn. Cornelius S. Afranius who being Conul, was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians at Lipara when he had by the law,
For this year, Cassiodorus penned down P. Servilius and C. Aurelius, Cicero in his book On senators, that there were twice Conuls, which also is apparent by the Capitoll and Sicilian tables: in which their furnamce are to be seen, Gemmae II. and Cotta II.

For Conuls this year, Cassiodorus penned down P. Servilius and C. Aurelius, Cicero in his book On senators, that there were twice Conuls, which also is apparent by the Capitol and Sicilian tables: in which their furname are to be seen, Gemmae II. and Cotta II.

For Conuls this year, Cassiodorus penned down P. Servilius and C. Aurelius, Cicero in his book On senators, that there were twice Conuls, which also is apparent by the Capitol and Sicilian tables: in which their furnames are to be seen, Gemmae II. and Cotta II.

For Conuls this year, Cassiodorus penned down P. Servilius and C. Aurelius, Cicero in his book On senators, that there were twice Conuls, which also is apparent by the Capitol and Sicilian tables: in which their furnames are to be seen, Gemmae II. and Cotta II.

The Calendar

Q. Latianus Cereo. A. Maximus.

Cassiodorus, Entropius, and Orofus, shew for consuls this year, Q. Latianus, and A. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Cereo and Torgiatus. They of the capital, Q. Latianus Cereo, and A., Manlius Torgiatus Atticus II. Indeed C. Latianus Cereo, is named for an Embassador by Livy in his 42 book.

C. Claudius Cebro. M. Sempronius

For this year there were Consuls, C. Claudius Cebro, and M. Sempronius Tudatos, according to Cassiodorus and the capital writers. The Sicilian records testify also the same surnames. Of these consuls likewise, besides the capital writers, Cicero speaketh in his Caro and Brutus, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Atticus, wherto Varro also agree) the 514 year from the foundation of the city; as also in his first Tusculan question. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chapter, and C. Siodorus.

C. Manilius. Q. Valerius.

Next there followed in consuls place, as witneseth Cassiodorus, C. Manilius and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian registrates, Turrinus and Fulo; and after the capital records, C. Manilius Turrinus, and Q. Valerius Fulo. Besides, Verrini Placenti and Cassiodorus, Gellius also maketh mention of these Coif, in his 17 book and 21 chapter. So doth Cicero in Brutus and the Tusculan questions, in which year they say, that Ennius the Poet was born.

T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

For the year following, Cassiodorus hath consuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius, Gracchus and Fulo, in Capitoline Kalender and the Sicilian records, Zonarius avoucheth, Sempr. Gracchus, and P. Valerius. The capital writers have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius Fulo. Orosius speakeith of these consuls.

L. Cornelius. Q. Fabius.

Next to them, Cassiodorus reporteth for consuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fabius, Zosimus, L. Lentulus and Q. Flaccus, Entropius, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fabius Flaccus. The capital registrates give to Lentulus, the surname Caudinius: and therefore in Capitoline Kalender, they stand by the names of Caudinius and Flaccus. As for the Sicilian registrates, they leave them out clean.

C. Licinius. P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius, Zonarius, P. Lentulus, and Licinius Varus. The capitoline writers, C. Licinius Varus, and P. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinius. In like manner Ce feroriius; who reckonneth this for the 515 year after the cities foundation: following herein the computation of Varro, Cereon, and Plutarch, Capitoline Kalender and the Sicilian registrates, name them Claudius and Varus.

T. Manius Torgiatus. C. Atticus.

This year had for consuls, as Cassiodorus faith, T. Manius Torgiatus, and C. Atticus. The Sicilian records, shew Torgiatus and Bullius: but Entropius, Orofus, and the capital Tables shew, T. Manius Torgiatus, and C. Atticus Bullius: unto Bulius the capital records put to the numeral note 11. When T. Manius Torgiatus and C. Atticus Bullius the second time were coif, according to Verrius Flaccus, Entropius, Orofus, and Cassiodorus, and that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the Temple of Janus was shut that the second time, as Plutarch theweth in Numu.; as Livy also, Fellinus, Entropius, and Orofus do testify.

L. Ponsimus. C. Carullus.

Cassiodorus nameth for consuls this year, L. Ponsimus and Sp. Carullus. The Sicilian registrates have Albinius and Roga, Zonarius, Ponsimus Albinius, and Sp. Carullus. The capital writers have L. Ponsimus Albinius, and Sp. Carullus Maximus. That Roga was a surname to the Carullus, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carullus Roga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M. Pomponius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, Q. Fabius and M. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matho. The capitoline writers have Q. Fabius Maximus Verucicculus, and M. Pomponius Matho. Zonarius hath Q. Fabius Max and M. Pomponius. The surname of Maximus, this Fabius took of his grand-father, and was not himself the first of that name, whatsoever Polybius writeth in his third book.
Nero he was called besides of a writ upon his lip, at Ptolemaic written, and he that wrote the treatise of Famous men.

M. Lepidus, M. Poppicius.

Arcus Lepidus and M. Poppicius are reputed to be Consuls this year by Censorinus. The Sicilian regissers have Lepidus and Malcius. Zonomys hath M. Malcius and Emelius. The capital records shew M. Emelius Lepidus and M. Poppicius.

C. Papirius, M. Pomponius.

Next after this were created Consuls, C. Papirius and M. Pomponius according to Censorinus, Zonaras, and Dionysius in his second book. The Sicilian regissers shew Majo and Malbo. But the capital records have C. Papirius Majo and M. Pomponius Malbo. Of C. Papirius, top of C., surnamed Majo, a Pontiff or Bishop, Livi spakeoth in the year 540.

M. Emelius, M. Junius.

L. Postumius, Cn. Fulvius.

Here are by Censorinus nominated for Consuls this year: Q. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian regissers Maximus and Vogum. The Capitol writers fea looke unto Carvilius Maximus the mark and numeral note of a double Consulship. Cicero in his book entitled Care. likewise in his second book of Rhetorical invention, makes mention of these Consuls, and so doth Valerius in his chapter, discomposing of the kindnes and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

P. Valerius, M. Atellus.

Here are set down by Censorinus for Coell this year, P. Valerius and M. Atellus. The Sicilian regissers, have Fleccus and Regularus. The Capitol records represent P. Valerius Fleccus, and M. Atellus Regularus. Censorinus writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

L. Apollius, M. Valerius.

C. Atellus, L. Aeumius.

Immediately followed Consuls, C. Atellus and L. Aeumius, as Censorinus and Polybius do witness: whom the Capitol writers call, C. Atellus Regularus, and L. Aeumius Populus. The Sicilian regissers, Regulus and Populus, Zonaras, Regulus and Aeumius. Of these Consuls also Polybius maketh mention: and Polybius in his third book and twentieth chapter, where untruly men read Pusillus Populus.

T. Manlius, Q. Fulvius I.

The year following had Consuls T. Manlius and Q. Fulvius the second time, according to Censorinus and Polybius, and as Orosius faith, T. Manlius Tergatus and Q. Fulvius Placentus. Censorinus tables, together with the Capitol, have Tergatus the second time, and Fulvius likewise the second time, shewing the surnames only of these Coell,

C. Flaminius, P. Furius Philus.

Censorinus setteth down for Coell, C. Flaminius and P. Furius. So doth Polybius, Zonaras nameth them Flaminius and Furius, Plutarch likewise in Marcellus. The Sicilian tables name them Flaminius and Philus. But the capital records, C. Flaminius, and P. Furius Philus.

M. Marcellus, Cn. Cornelius.

Censorinus nameth for the next Consuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Polybius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian regissers Seicio and Marcellus, Zonaras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Seicio, Entropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Seicio. The Capitol tables, M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius Seicio Colons. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Consul: and this is that Seicio, who afterwards with his brother Seicio was slain in Spain by Aeschnath the Carthaginian.

P. Cornelius, M. Minnius.

Censorinus sheweth for this years Consuls, C. Cornelius and M. Minnius. So doth Zonar.
The Sicilian regicides have Scipio and Emelius, Eutropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minucius Rufus, Cisilian book Afina and Rufus. Sigerius and Omeriophius both, do think that this P. Cornelius Scipio Afina was his son, who in the first Punick war was twice consul. And verily Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Afina, an honorable Senator, and who had been consul.

534 L. Veturius. C. Lentinius.

535 M. Livius. L. Emelius.

The consuls next following were M. Livius and L. Emelius, as Cisfadonius witnesseth. Cisilian book and the Greek records shew Selinutor and Paulus. Zonarcs, M. Livius and Emelius Paulus. Pliny maketh mention of these consuls in the 29 book and first chap.

536 P. Cornelius Scipio, T. Sempronius Longus.

C. Affedorus and Polybius put down for consul P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius, Zonarcs, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Eutropius, Probus, Orosius, and Paulus, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. While these were consuls, the second Punick war arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

537 On, Serviliius Gemellus, C. Flamininius.

Then followed consuls, as Polybius, Caifadonius, and Livy write, On, Serviliius, together with C. Flamininius. But the two last named, as also the Sicilian regicides, have given to Serviliius the surname of Gemellus. C. Flamininius now second time consul, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magistracy in the isle of March not at Rome but at Ariminum. The same man, in neglect and contempt of the auguries or signs of birds, at what time as he made head and went against Annibal coming into Italy, fought a battle at the lake Thrasymenus, where his army was wholly defeated and himself lost his life: into whose place M. Asilius Regulus, who had been consul before, was substituted. Thus much out of Livy and Polybius.

538 C. Terentius Varro, L. Emelius Paulus.

Next to them Polybius bringeth in L. Emelius and C. Terentius for consul. The Sicilian regicides, Paulus and Varro, Plutarch in Paulus, Terentius Varro, and Emelius Paulus, Livy, Caifadonius, and others, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Emelius Paulus. Gellius noteth, that the father of C. Terentius Varro, was one Aulus; a thing by others passed over.

Livy reporteth that the consuls elect for this year, when M. Janius the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election, were Lucius Pobulius Illius the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gaul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been master of the horsemen; and that Pobulius before that he entered in government, was by Annibal in France environed and slain, in whose stead M. Marcellus was subrogated consul now the second time: who upon information given by the Augurs, that his creation was not good, resigned: and commonly the Nobles gave out and said, That the Gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen consuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen consul the third time. Thus write Livy and Plutarch. And for this cause it is that Caifadonius, Orosius, and Eutropius do put down for this years consuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

540 Q. Fabius. IV. M. Claudius Marcellus. III.

Livy, Plutarch, and Caifadonius, set out for consuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentimes and in his second book of satiragens, make mention of these consuls.

541 Q. Fabius Max. son of Verres. T. Sempronius Gracchus. II.

Against this year were both the consuls created in their absence, namely, Q. Fabius, the son of Verres, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time: as Livy tellith and Caifadonius, together with the Sicilian regicides. This Fabius had been Proctor the former year; and Gracchus consul two years before. These consuls Gellius nominateth out of Quadrigarii, the second book and second chapter. Likewise Cicero and Velletri.

542 App. Claudius Pulcher. Q. Enulius Flaccus. III.

The consuls created for this year by the Dictator, were Quintus Enulius Flaccus the third time, who then was master of the horsemen, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who in his pretorship was L, deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Plutarch in Fabius, Caflidius, and Orosius in his 17 book do witnes.

C. Sulpicius Galba, Cu. Fulvius Centumalus,

Vpon the receipt of certain letters, the Consuls agreed together, that Clandlus should hold the election for magistrats and fee fiished, whiles Fabius remained still before Capua, Claudius created for consuls, Cu. Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpicius on of Servius, and summarized Galba, who before time had born no state-office of the chair. Thus wrote Livy. The same consuls also Caflidius doth deliver, Orosius likewise and Fulvia in his 17 book. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumalus. As for S. Sulpicius, he is named in his second consulsip, as it appeareth upon record in the capitol, the ion of Ser, nephew of Pultius summarized Galba Maximus,

M. Valerius, II. M. Claudius Marcellus, IV,

Livy, Sexius Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Eutropius, and Orosius, do present for consuls this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius. Now this is Marcellus his fourth consulsip, as Plutarch and Livy write: but Caflidius faith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius, leaving out that consulsip which he bare not through, because of the error in his creation; and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have borne. Livy in the nine and twenty and thirtieth books, writeth that M. Valerius was twice consulsip. In like manner, the book of Caflidius hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time, and Livius the second time, and therefore Orosius supposeth that his first consulsip was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty: and his second, now. Of him Pultius and Cicero make mention.

Q. Fabius Maximus, V.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus, IV.

The consuls this year created, were Q. Fabius the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the fourth time, the same man who being Dictor, held the assembly for that election; as Livy and Caflidius do witnes. The Sicilian records let forth Fabius and Flaccus. While these were consuls, Cicero in his Oration against Balbus, faith that Capua was won: and yet Livy hath reported it two years before. Of these consuls Valerius also, together with Plutarch, Eutropius, and Orosius have made mention.

M. Claudius Marcellus, V.
T. Quinius Crispinus,

In the eleventh year of the Punic war, there entered into their consulsip, M. Marcellus this last time (fo ye reckon that consulsip which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quinius Crispinus, So hath Livy. Plutarch also nameth Marcellus the last time and Crispinus. But Caflidius reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Crispinus, pathing over that faulty consulsip of his. Moreover these consuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius, Phinius the yonger, Prebas, Eutropius, and Orosius: who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Ambaibs: in so much as Marcellus was presently slain in the place, and Quinius fled forth wounded.

C. Claudius Nero.
M. Livius Salinator.

Vhen the II. of the Senate cast about to see whom they should create consuls, behold, the most eminent and singular man above all others, was C. Claudius Nero: unto whom was joined as companion in government, M. Livius, who many years before, upon a consulsip that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned: and almost eight years after his condemnation was by Marcus Marcellus, and Marcus Livius their consuls, reduced into the city. In like manner, the Sicilian Registors name for consuls, Nero and Salinator. The capitol records show Cains Claudius Nero, with M. Livius Salinator.

Q. Caecilius Metellus, L. Veturius Philo,

Livy, Caflidius, and the records of the capitol, exhibit unto us for consuls this year, L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caecilii Metellus, The Sicilian registors, Metellus and Philo. Over and beside, of these consuls Cicero many a time and often, Valerius, Plutarch in Africanus, Appicius in Ibericus, Pliny in his 7 book 43 chap, do make mention.

549

P. Cornelius Scipio.
P. Licinius Craeffus.

Livy, Veturius Philo held the assembly for creation of Magistrats, wherein all the centuries in general, with exceeding great favour nominated Pultius Scipio for consuls, and to him was joined in government, P. Licinius Craeffus, the supream pontify. Thus saith Livy. The Sicilian tables have Scipio with Craeffus. The capitol records shew P. Cornelius Scipio.
The Cronologie

Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Crassus the rich, of whom Caffiodorus likedwife and Cicero in Bruces do speak.

M. Cornelius Cæthogus, P. Sempr. Tidarianus.

Livy, Caffiiodorus and the capitol records do name for Consuls this year, P. Sempronius Tidarianus, and M. Cornelius Cæthogus. The Sicilian registers, Cæthogus and Tidarianus, of whom Cicero in Bruces, Plutarch, Eutropius and Caffiodorus do often time make mention. In this year P. Scipio Naesent, judged by the Senate the best man in the city, received dame Idea.

Cn. Servilius Capio, C. Servilius

Livy and Caffiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitol monuments, put unto us for Consuls Cn. Servilius Capio and C. Servilius. Of which twain Capio had been Pretor in the year 548, and Servilius in 547. This year died Q. Fabius Max, and Annibald with a fat cheer and heavy heart departed out of Italy into Africa by commandment of certain delegate Embassadors, in the seventeenth year of the second Punic war.

Marcus Servilius Geminus, and Tib. Claudius Nero were Consuls this year according to Livy, Caffiodorus, and the capitol records, in which Servilius surnamed Pulex, Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In these Consuls year, Annibald was in Africa by Scipio overthrown, and a second peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and Eutropius do report.

553

Against this year were created Consuls, as Livy writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lemnus, and P. Aelius Pannus. So faith Caffiodorus also and Pline in his eighteenth book and eighteenth chapter. In a broken piece of marble in the Capitol, we find Lemnus and P. Aelius in the Sicilian registers, Lemnus and Pannus. These two were Pretors both in the year 550.

P. Sulpicius Galba, C. Aurelius Cotta.

Livy and Caffiiodorus put down for Consuls, P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpicius in the year 542 was first Consul; and C. Cotta two years before, Pretor. These same Consuls are to be seen in the capitol tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian.
second time, and T. Sempronius Longus. Of them Cæcero maketh mention in the erection of Cornelia accused of felony, appeareth in Pedanius.

L. Cornelia Merula, Q. Minutius Thermus,

Livy, Caius Fabia, and the capital authors, write that the Consuls chosen to succeed in this year, were L. Cornelia Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The said surnames are found in the Sicilian records, Probus speaketh of them in Annals, and Frontius in his book of Fragments.

L. Quintius Flaminius, C. Domitius Aemilianus,

Nero Quintius Flaminius, and Cn. Domitius Aemilianus were this year Consuls, as Livy, Caius Fabia, and the capital records testify. The Sicilian registers also flow their surnames.

M. Acilius Glabrio, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

The Consuls created for this year, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, son of Cn, as surnames Livy, Caius Fabia, the capital records, Plutarch in Quinianus, and Appian in his Syracusian history. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls year the fame authors report that the war against Antiocbus King of Syria, and against the Etiolians, was proclaimed: which in the capital monuments, in Paterculus, and Macrobius, is called the Antiochian, but by Florus and Pliny the younger in Cato, the Syrian war. This was the 562 year from the cities foundation, as Macrobius writeth in his first book of Saturnis.

L. Cornelia Scipio, C. Latinius.

Caius Fabia, Livius, and M. Acilius Glabrio, the capital tables put down for Consuls this year, L. Cornelia Scipio and C. Latinius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Latinius. The same men were in his sixteenth book, and fourth chapter named C. Latinius son of C. and L. Scipio of P. To Latinius Caius Fabia only addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Africanus, was brother to Africanus.

C. Mamilianus Pullo, M. Fulvius Nobilior,

Cn. Mamilianus Vallo, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this year by Livy, Caius Fabia, and the tables both of the capital and Sicily, Mamilianus was Pretor in the year 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

C. Lucius Sallustius, M. Valerianus Messala,

The Consuls next following, were M. Valerianus Messala, and C. Lucius Sallustius, as Livy and Caius Fabia report, together with the Sicilian and capital tables.

M. Aemilius Lepidus, C. Flaminius,

The next Consuls, were M. Aemilius Lepidus, and C. Flaminius, as Livy, Caius Fabia, Suetonius Strabo in his first book, the Sicilian and capital tables. Of them Valerianus maketh mention in his fifth book, This is that M. Lepidus who was the Arch-bishop, twice Consul, Censor, and President of the Senate six times chosen by the Senators. And this is that C. Flaminius, who afterward by Cato the Censor was displaced out of the Senate and distroyed.

S. Pesteimius Albinus, Q. Marcius Philippus,

Livy, Caius Fabia, the capital tables report Consuls for this year, S. Pesteimius Albinus, and Q. Marcius Philippus. The Sicilian Registers name them barely. Albinus and Philippus, Valerianus maketh mention of them in his last book and third chapter. Likewise Pliny in his 53 book and tenth chapter.

P. Claudius Pulcher, M. Sempronius Tidtanianus.

For this years Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, & M. Sempronius Tidtanianus, as Livy, Caius Fabia, and the capital records do testify. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tidtanianus.

P. Claudius Pulcher, L. Porcius Glicinius.

The Consuls that followed for this year, were L. Porcius Glicinius & P. Claudius Pulcher: witnesses Livy, Caius Fabia, and the capital tables, Pulcher and Glicinius they be called in the Sicilian records.

Q. Fabius Labeo, M. Claudius Marcellus.

Against this year were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius Labeo according to Livy, Caius Fabia & the capital marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables, Whereas these were consuls, Attius wrote that Annibal died, as Probus maketh report in Annals.

L. Aemilius Paulus, Cn. Babinius Tampillus.

Cn. Babinius Tampillus and L. Aemilius Paulus were created Consuls for this year, as Livy, Caius Fabia, the capital, yea, and the Sicilian tables do testify, although their last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Aemilius is the son of that L. Aemilius, who was slain at Cannae, as Plutarch and Velleius de warre,

P. Cæcilius Cæcilius, M. Balbinus Tamphus.

574
A. Posthumius Albinius, C. Calpurnius Piso.

575
L. Manlius Acidinius, Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

576
M. Iunius Brutus, A. Manlius Vipsa.

577
C. Claudius Pulcher, Tih. Sempronius Gracchus.

578
C. Cornelius Scipio Hispulas, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Valerius Levnius.

579
P. Marcius Scævola, M. Cæcilius Lepidus II.

Q. Posthumius Albinius, Q. Marcius Scævola.

581
L. Posthumius Albinius, M. Popilius Lanus.

582
C. Popilius Lanus, P. Aelius Licanus.

T. He Coss for this year created were L. Posthumius Albinius and M. Popilius Lanus, as L. Coss, Caffiodorus, and the capitol records do testify, Albinius and Lanus are put down in the Sicilian records. While these were consuls, the feast Floralia was instituted first, as omnium beveeth in his fit book of his Kalender.
The Consuls next ensuing for this year, were P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, as it appeareth in Livy, Caesiodorus, Orfus, and the capitol tables. For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwise than Crassus and Longus. Of the very same Consuls Pliny maketh mention in his seventh book, Gallus also in his ninth book and fourth chapter. Whiles these were Consuls the people of Rome began war against Persius King of the Macedonians, son of Philip: which Florus and Entropius, together with Orfus, call the second Macedonian war; whereas Livy and Plutarch write more at large.

A. HusiU: Manicius, A. Acilius Servanus.

Cassiodorus next after for Consuls, C. Husius Mancius, and C. Asilius. The Sicilian regilsters, Mancius and Servanus. The capitol monuments, A. Asilius Mancius, and As. Asilius Servus, as well the election of these Consuls as their acts, are missing in the Annals of Livy.

Q. M. Marius Philippus, II. Cn. Servullus Capio.

Livy, Caesiodorus, and the capitol tables match together in the Consulship of this year Q. Marius Philippus the second time, and Cn. Servullus Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philip and Capio. Cicero in his books entitled Brutus and Caes, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Consulat.

L. Aemilius Paulus, II. C. Licinius Crassus.

The Consuls: that next succeeded were Lu. Caesiodorus the second time (seventeen years after his first Consulship) and Cn. Licinius Crassus: witnesses Livy, Caesiodorus, and the capitol monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian regilsters Paulus and Crassus. As touching this second Consulat of L. Paulus, Plutarch, Velisius, Orfus, Entropius, Florus, and Iulius in his 53 book do write, Plutarch addeth thus much and taith, That Paulus was threecore years of age, when he was chosen Consul the second time.

Q. Qelius Patus, M. Junius.

M. Marcellus, C. Sulpius.

Livy and the capitol monuments shew for this years Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Sulpius Gallus. Oflesquem, and the title prefired before the comedy Andria in Terence, exhibit Mar, Marcellus and C. Sulpius. This is that Marcellus, who after he had been thrice Consul, perished in the sea. Nephew he was of that M. Marcellus, who had been five times Consul, as Padinus reporteth. Of these Consuls, Ifineus, Pliny in his second book, and many other have made mention.

Cn. Othoavius, T. Manlius.

Caesiodorus and Othoavius infer Consuls this year, Cn. Othoavius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables. Othoavius and T. Manlius. The capitoliones. Othoavius and T. Manlius. Mention there is made of these consuls in the list, before Heyacin in Terence. Cicero in his first book of Final ends, and likewise in many other places, speaketh of T. Manlius, Consul with Cn. Othoavius.

A. Manlius, Q. Caisius.

Cassiodorus matcheth together consuls in this year, A. Manlius and Q. Cassius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquatus and Longinus. The capitol records A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Cassius Longinus, who died in his consulship. These also had been companions together in their Pretorship, anno 586, as Livy beareth witness.

T. Sempronius, M. Invenutius.

Cassiodorus faith, that the consuls this year were T. Sempronius and M. Invenutius. Oflesquem name them, T. Gracchus, and M. Invenutius. The capitol monuments shew T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, and M. Invenutius Tha. In the Sicilian regilsters, Delabellae and Tha, but not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valerius, and Plutarch have made mention of Tha, Gracchus twice consul. And that M. Invenutius died while he was consul, Pliny in his seventh book, and Valerius also do report.

P. Cornilius Scipio Nasica, C. Marius.

Cicero in his first and second book of the nature of Gods, Veretius Plancus, Obelgens and Caesiodorus, report for consuls P. Cornil, Scipio Nasica and C. Marius Figilius. But for that there was an error committed in their creation, and thereupon they resigned their places, as the foresaid authors witness, together with Valerius Plutarch, and Pliny; P. Corn, Lentulus, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, entered in their stead.
M. Messula, C. Fannius.

L. Anicius, M. Cornelius Cæcilius.

Caesidius and the title set before the Comedy Adelphes in Terence avouch for Cn. Cornelius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers shew Dolabella and Fulvius. The capitol monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and Mar. Fulvius Nobilior. The same is to be seen in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their year he died.

N. Æmilius, C. Popilius.

The Consuls next succeeding, were Marcus Æmilius and C. Popilius, as Caesidius saith. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Lewis. The capitol records have M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lewis the second time. Of the same Cesarius maketh mention in his chapter of distinction of ages.

Sex. Filius, L. Aurelius.

Caesidius reporteth, that the next Consuls were Sex. Filius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian and capitol tables yield surnames unto them, Sex. Filius to Fulvius, and Orestes to Aurelius. Pliny writeth of them in his 33 book.

L. Licinius, C. Martius.

Orestes and Caesidius record for this years Consuls L. Licinius and C. Martius. The Sicilian catalogue Lenticus and Fignus. The capitol monuments, L. Cornelius Lenticus Lugus; and C. Martius Fignus, the second time.

Cicero in Brutus speakeith of them both. And as touching Fignus twice Consul, Valerius writeth in his chapter of Wrath.

P. Scipio Nasica. M. Claudius.

In this year both Scipio and M. Claudius are by Caesidius set down for Cn. Messala and Q. Opimius. The Sicilian tables, both in the capitol records, M. Valerius Scipio Nasica the second time, and M. Claudius Marcellus likewise the second time, Pedarius writeth, that this Marcellus was thrice Consul, and that the Cn. Scipio Nasica, named also Cornelian, was twice Consul and Senator besides, Cicero writeith in his Brutus.

L. Pompeius, Q. Opimius.

This year had Consuls, L. Pompeius and Q. Opimius as Caesidius doth and Orestes doth witness. The Sicilian tables shew Opimius and Albinus. But the capitol records Q. Opimius, and L. Pompeius Albinus. Mention there is made of this, Q. Opimius, Consul, by Cicero in his Brutus: also in the Epitome of the seventh and fortieth book. Moreover, that Pompeius died in his magistracy, besides Verris Flaccus, Obtuse also sheweth: in whose stead Man. Aeclius Glabrio was chosen.

Q. Fulvius, T. Annius.

The Consuls next following, as Caesidius writeth, were Q. Fulvius and T. Annius. In the capitol fragments they are named Nobilior and T. Annius. In the Sicilian registers, Nobilior and Lusius, Cicero in his Brutus saith, that Q. Nobilior son of Marcus, and T. Annius Lusius were Consuls. The Greek records and Caesidius shew Nobilior and Lusius.

M. Marcellus, L. Valerius.

This year had for Consuls, M. Marcellus and L. Valerius as Caesidius witnesseth. The Sicilian catalogue repeateth Marcellus and Flaccus. Orestes sheweth unto us M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus. This Marcellus was thrice Consul, as Pedarius saith upon the Oration for Servius, and Cicero in his book of divination and destiny.

L. Licinius Lucullus, A. Postumius Albinius.

L. Licinius Lucullus, A. Postumius Albinius.
T. Quinctius, M. Aelius.

This year had for Conuliis, T. Quinctius and M. Aelius, as Cassiodorus telleth, whom Pliny in his 7 book 36 chap, calleth C. Quinctius and M. Aelius. Cicero in his book 24, and the 12 book of his Epitales to Atticus name T. Flaminius and M. Aelius, and faith that they were created Conuliis in the 19 year after the death of Emnius. The Sicilian tables have Flaminius and Balbus. The Capitol fragments, Flaminius and M. Aelius. Balbus.

Cassiodorus avoucheth for the Conuliis of this year, L. Marcius and M. Manlius: likewise the 49 Epitale, Cicero in Lucullus maketh mention of Censorinus and M. Manlius: of Censorinus and Manlius in his twelfth book of epitales to Atticus. The same Conuliis, Appianus in Libya name L. Marcius Censorinus and M. Manlius. In like fort Conserinus in his treatise of Nativity or Birth-day. The Sicilian tables have Censorinus and Manlius. The capital fragments shew Censorinus and M. Manlius, son of Publius, nephew of Publius. While theirs were Conuliis, there arose a third war between the State of Rome and the Carthaginians, as Florus in the 49 Epitome, besides Censorinus Florus do testifie: likewise Sallust, but he faith with Verres Florus, that it was the year 64, Cicero also in his eleventh Philippick, and lately Entropius, with Orosius.

Sp. Postumius, L. Piso. The Hen were Conuliis created, Sp. Postumius and L. Piso, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In the capital fragments they are named A. Magnus, and Lu. Calpurnius, son of Caiaus, nephew of Caiaus, furnamed Piso Censorinus. In Censorinus Kalender, Magnus and Censorinus, in the Sicilian catalogue Albinius and Piso. As for Magnus and Albinius, they are the furnames of Postumius: like as Censorinus and Piso, of Calpurnius. In this year the people of Rome, entred into arms against Andronicus, other wise termed Pseudo-Philipps, which they call the third Macedonian war, after Florus and Entropius.

P. Africanus, C. Livios.

Obsequens and Cassiodorus set forth for conuliis this year P. Africanus and C. Livins. In the Sicilian catalogue they are registred Sepio and Denius: in the capital fragments Afriuus Amphilus, and C. Livins: the one son of M. Amphilus, nephew of Marcus, the other furnishad Denius. This Pub. Cornelius was the natural son of that Paullus that vanquished Persea King of the Macedonians, and adopted by P. Cornelius the son of Sepio Africanus, Whereupon he was called Pub. Cornelius, son of Paullus, nephew of P. Sepio Africanus the younger, and Amphilus, as Vellius and others do witnesse. His two last furnames are in the capital records, out of which, the complete name of M. Livius Drisfas, with his addition, was framed. Of these Conuliis Cicero speaketh after: likewise Valerius, Petronius, Appian, Plutarch, Florius, both Plutarch, Entropius and Orosius.

C. Cornelius, L. Mammius.

Next conuliis following, were Cn. Cornelius and L. Mammius, as witnesseb Cassiodorus: and according to Orosius, Vellius, Consorinus, and Cicero in the thirteenth book of epitales to Atticus, Cn. Cornelius Leantius and L. Mammius they are named. In the Sicilian registrates Leantius and Mammius. In the fragments of the capital, Leantius and L. Mammius, nephew of Lucius, L. Mammius in this magistracy acquired the furname of Achmeu, upon a victory achived by him in Asia, as Ptolemy in Marinus, and Vellius do testifie.

Q. Fabius Maximus, L. Hosfilius.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth unto us for Conuliis Q. Fabius Maximus, together with L. Hosfilius. Cicero in Lucullus, and Pliny in his five and thirtieth book and fourth chapter, name them Qn. Maximus, brother of Sepio, and L. Mammius. Of this Q. Enlius Maximus Amphilus, Valerius, and Scribanius, wrote in his second book and fourth chapter. This Q. Fabius was the son of P. Enlius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max, the son of Verres, as Appianus writeth in Hispania: and therefore in the fragment of a capital table there is to be seen the second furname Eumphilus. Pliny was deceived, when he in his 32 book 11 chapter calleth him Qn. Allobrogicus, brother of Sepio, who was the son of this Fabius.

Ser. Galba, L. Aurelius.

This year had for Conuliis, Ser. Galba and Lu. Aurelius, according to Cassiodorus: theole, Valerius in his six book name St. Subtius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capital fragments have Galba and L. Valerius Cotta. This is that Seip. Galba, who being Pector, as Sutonius writeth, stirred up the war before against Ptolemy, for he was a vehement Orator, of whom Cicero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was whom afterwards being accused by Africanus, Qn. Metellus Macedonianus defended, Cicero in Brutus, for Marcus and against Verres make mention of him. Likewise Frontius of them both, in his first book of water-conduits.

The Chronologie

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls Appius Claudius and Q. Metellus, Orosius, App. Claudius and Q. Caecilius Metellus. The Sicilian registerers have Claudius and Metellus. The capitolt fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Caecilius Macedonius. Of the fampe, Fromontius speaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his leventh book. Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, subdued the Macedonians and Acharians, wereupon he was named Macedonius, whom Pliny 7 book sheweth to be the son of Lu, and nephew of Quin.

Cassiodorus putteith down for Consuls, L. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Maximus, Orosius, L. Caecilius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilius. In like manner the capitolt fragments Callius and Servilius. This Servilius is the brother-german of Q. Servilius, Cepio, the Conful two years after, as witnesseth Appian and the adoptod son of Q. Fabius Emelius, for they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Mac, the son of Verneus, the one out of the house Regulus, the other of Servilius. L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Macedonius, as writeth Valerius in his treatise of Witnesses.

Ca. Capio, Q. Pompeius.

Cassiodorus and Q. Pompeius are recounted Consuls by Cassiodorus, Velitius in his second book faith thus: Whether there were two or three houses of the Pompeius, the first of that name was Consul with Ca. Servilius. This Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that he was of base and obscure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witneffes nameth Assidus, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in stead of Am. F. i, the son of Aulus, in the name for Appianus in Historiens nameth him Qn. Pompeius Asius for A. Filius, Cicero in his Orations against Verres, and in that for Fontius, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servillii Capios. 614

Q. Capio, C. Larin.

After this were Consuls made Qn. Capio and C. Larin, my authors are Cassiodorus and Obsequens together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits. This Larin as Cicero in his eleventh Philippick, and Valerius de report, was the son of Larin the the Consul, anno 564, whom as Cicero in his second book of Duties and in Larin, was the first that was named Wile, whereof Plutarch in Gracchi yeeldeth a reason.

Ca. Piso, M. Popilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, Ca. Piso with M. Popilius. Apionius and the Epitomist have M. Popilius Larus: but they be named M. Popilius Larus and L. Calpurnius by Valerius in his first book, writing thus, That Cornelius Hispalus, Lord chief justice for strangers, when M. Popilius Larus and L. Calpurnius were Consuls, by an edict commanded all the Calidians [Africologers] to depart out of Rome and Italy within ten daies next ensuing.

P. Scipio, D. Brutus.

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Consl, by Cassiodorus, Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nasca (in named Scipio in mockery by C. Curianus a Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Consul, levied and muttered fouldiers, &c. This Scipio was feon of that Nasca who was named Cornelius, and twice was he Conful and Centor also, recepeth to that Nasca, who by the Senat was deemed the best man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Ingarus, as Velitius faith. This Decius Brutus, Cicero in his Brutus calleth the son of Marcus, who bare the Confulship in the year five hundred ninety seven, and in the capitolt tables is called Pennis. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft, Velitius also in his 3 book, chap. 7, 5 book, chap. 3, 9 book, chap. 15: Likewise, Pliny in his 21 book, and laffly, Fromontius.

M. Emelius, C. Hostilius Mancinus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens match together in the Consulship this year, M. Emelius, and C. Hostilius Mancinus. The Sicilian registerers L. Lepidus and Mancinus, Orosius and Apionius, M. Emelius Lepidus and C. Hostilius Mancinus. Of this Conful Mancinus there remain yet some tokens to be feen in broken marble of the capitol. Cicero maketh mention often-times of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatise of Famous men.

P. Furins, Sex. Attilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus putteith down for Consuls, P. Furins and Sex. Attilius Serranus. Cicero in his third book of Duties, L. Furins and Sex. Attilius, Obsequens, L. Furins and Attilius Serranus. The Sicilian registerers Phidus and Serranus. Of this Furins, Cicero writeth thus in his Brutus; I. M. Furins Phidus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have spoken more learndly than others. In the capitalt fragments there appeareth yet some shew of Serranus the Conful.
The next consuls are set down by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, Ser. Aurelius and Q. Calpurnius.

The year following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaccus for Q. Calpurnius Piso, as it is written in Cassiodorus and Obsequens; but Servio and Flaccus in the Sicilian catalogue. The same Flaccus the Capitol fragments do they, of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 56 Epitome; and of Africanus twice consul, by Appian in Hispania, by Orofius, Florini, and Valerini in his eight book.

P. Africanus, C. Fulvius Flaccus.

This year had consuls, P. Mucius, and L. Calpurnius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian register theyw Secundus and Calpurnius, Velleius nameth P. Mucius Secundus and L. Calpurnius. Thee of Consuls Velleius upon the orations against Verres, maketh mention, in which words Secundus a right learned man in the Laws, was consuli with L. Piso, that year where-in Tiberius was killed. In the broken marbles of the Capitol he flangeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Piso, furnamed also Frugi; and that truly. For Cicero in one Oration against Verres, and in another for Fonteius, writeth, that he was the fift of the Piones, named Frugi. This man, when he was Tribunus or Provovll of the Commons, made a law against the extortion of magistrates, when Marcus and Manlius were consuls; he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his book Brutus.

P. Mucius, L. Calpurnius.

A point Clodius and M. Perpennus are matched in the Confulat together this year by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Culpinius book and the Greek records, show Lentulus and Perpennus. This Clodius haply was adopted into the family of the Corneli. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancinus, calleth this man C. Clodius. This also is confirmed by an old table of stones commonly known, wherein is to be feed this inscription, C. Clodius and M. Perpennus, of this M. Perpennus as many as wrote the war of Ariftonice, have made mention, and namely, Varinius in his 3 book and 4 chapter. Celleius, Sestus, Orosius, and Eutropius.

C. Sempronius, M. Aquilius.

This year had consuls, M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. But Aquilius and Titanius according to the Siciliani registers, C. Sempronius Tadinius, and M. Aquilius after Orosius, Cicero speakeh of them in his book of the nature of gods, and to his brother Quintus. Paterculus also in his second book, Sestus in his 14 book. Appian in his first book. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitol.

Cn. Olavius, T. Annius.

Next followed as consuls Cn. Olavius and T. Annius, at Cassiodorus testifieth, but not he. For Cassiodorus book and the Sicilian catalogue, have Olavius and Rufus. Plutarch also writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a sedition. As for this Cn. Olavius

Cn. Olavius, T. Annius.
The Chronologie

The year of Caesar, 607.

L. Cassius, L. Cina.

Cassidors nameth for this years Consuls, L. Caius and L. Cina. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cina, Cassius; books set out Rufius corruptly for Roscella, and Cina. This L. Cassius was his son who bore the consulship in the year 590, and he was afterwards Censor in the year 629, famed Roscella by Frontinus.

M. Aemilius, L. Aurelius.

M. Plautius, M. Fufius.

Cassidors and Obsequens avouch Consuls this year, M. Plautius and M. Fufius. The Sicilian registers, Hypsiss and Flacus. Orsus and Frontinus in his treatise of water-ducts, M. Plautius Hypsiss and Mar. Fufius Flacus. Valerius also in his discourse of Pride maketh mention of them.

C. Caflius Longinus, C. Sexius.

Cassidors and Obsequens report, that the consuls following were C. Caflius Longinus, and C. Sexius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Longinus and Catulus. Pellemus writeth, that the colony Fabratoria was planted by Caflius and Catulus. Cicero in Brutus speaketh of C. Sexius Catulus, Entropius declareth for consuls, C. Caflius Longinus, and S. Domitius Catulus, not without suspicion of a fault or error.

Q. Caflius, T. Quininus.

Cassidors nominateth for consuls this year, Q. Caflius and T. Quininus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Flamininus. Entropius and Orsus. Q. Caflius, Metellus and T. Quininus Flamininus. Cicero in his Oration pleading for his house, calleth them T. Flamininus and Q. Metellus. This Q. Metellus was the elder of the four sons of Macedonians, whom Plutarch in his treatise of the Romans fortune, calleth Q. Mctellus Balareus, of the Balares whom in this magistracy he conquered.

Cn. Domitius, C. Fannius.

Cassidors and Obsequens join in fellowship of the consulate this year. Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Euphrates and Fannius, Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Plebs in his second book and 32 chapter. Three months (if so, he) appeared when Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius were Cn. which most men called the night-stars.

L. Oppianius, Q. Maximus.

This year had for consuls Lu. Oppianius and Q. Maximus, as written in Cassidors. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Oppianus and Maximus. But Obsequens, Lu. Oppianius and Q. Fabius Maximus. Pliny speaketh of them in his second book, laying, About the fun there appeared an arch or bow, when Lu. Oppianus and Q. Fabius were consuls. This Lu. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus. Florus in his Epitome, Pellicia in his 2 book, and Plutarch upon the Orations against Verres, rightly named the nephew of Paulinas, and son of E. Aurelius. And is may Strabo, Appian, and Pliny be well reproved, for making him and his father, Aemilius, all one. The same man, as Cicero and Pliny testify, was summi ded Allobrogian, upon a victory over the Allobroges. Of this L. Oppianus consul, after whose name there was a wine called Oppianum. Pliny maketh mention in his 14 book and 4 chapter. Plutarch also in C. Graecius, and Pellicia in his second book.

P. Marcius, C. Pappius.

Cassidors inferreth for this years consuls, P. Marcius and C. Pappius. The Sicilian records Marcius and Carbo. This is that Cass Pappius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the commons when Claudius and Pernius were Cn. was afterwards by C. Gracchus appointed for one of the Triumvirs to divide lands: who first took part with the commons, but afterwards ranged with the nobility: of whom Cicero in many other places, and namely, in his second book of a perfect Orator, maketh mention.

L. Caecilius, L. Aurelius.

Cassidors inferreth for this years consuls, L. Caecilius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue, Metellus and Cassia. Plutarch in Marcius speaketh of C. Metellus and Cassia consuls. Which Marcius he writeth to have born the Tribunship of the commons, when these were consuls, and to have cast Metellus the consul into prifon. This is that Cassa, in whole common room Velleius reporteth, that C. Caesar Flamin of Jupiter, was created.

M Cato, Q. Marcius.

This year had for consuls Mar. Cato and Q. Marcius. witnesseth Cassidors and Obsequens. Cato and Marcius, according to the Sicilian registers, but Entropius nameth them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Marcius. Valerius speaketh of

Caﬂodorus next ensuing by Caﬂodorus his saying, were L. Cælius and Q. Maximus. After the Sicilian catalogue Metellus and Scaevola; if ye go by Entropius L. Cælius Metellus and Q. Maximus Scaevola. Now in this is that L. Cælius Metellus, who afterwards upon troubling the Dalmatians, was named Dalmatius, whom Plutarch in Cæsarians and in his book of the Roman fortunes, nameth Dalmatius; for that in a long time he bound up his forehead with a frontlet or wreath which they call a diadem to hide an ulcer that he had there, Hereupon when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band of garter, It makes no matter,quad. Pauvinus, in what part of the body a man weareth the diadem: upbraiding and reproaching him for his Kinglike power, in terming a small clot or piece of cloth by that name. This is that Q. Maximus Scaevola the Angar, of whom Cicero in his book Latinis, and in the fifth book of an Orator maketh mention.

C. Licinius Cæsianus. Q. Maximus.

Caﬂodorus completh together in society of Conulhip this year, C. Licinius and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian catalogue name them Cæsianus and Eburinius, (this Q. Maximus Cicero speaketh in his Oration for Marcus.) That this man was the house of the Fabius, his named Eburinius Heweth, of whom writeth Pllustarch in this name: Qu. Fabius was called Eburinius, or named Eburinius, of whitencis, for that his butrock was blaited with lighting, Q. Isidius in his third Declamation reporteth, that this Fabius Eburinius had a son unhal of his body, whom he examined at home in his house, and thereupon put him to death. The same man Valerius call eth Qu. Fabius Servianus. As for the name of this Licinius his father, obscure and unknown heretofore, Galbezius out of an old antiquity of coin hath restored it, wherein, as he faith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Cæsianus, son of Publins.

M. Metellus. M. Scaevola.

The conuls next following by Caﬂodorus his report, were M. Metellus and M. Scaevola. As for Metellus, the third son he was of Macedoniens, But as touching M. Scaevola, whom the writer of the book entituled of famous per stos, calleth M. Aëtius, Scaevola, thus writeth Plutarch, M. Scaevola (qd. he) was a Partian indead and no blood but fo, as the gentry of his house for those dacies before him lay obscure for neither father, nor grand sire, by reason of their poor estate and for want of putting forth themselves in the world, attained to dignity in weal publick. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention oftentimes in his Oration for Moretus and in Brutus. Valerius also in his 5 book and 8 chap. and Pliny likewise in his 2 book and 36 chap.

M. Aëtius Balbus. C. Cato.

Caﬂodorus setteth down for conuls this year, M. Aëtius Balbus and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus and Cato, Olisiponens M. Aëtius and C. Porcius. Of the same conuls Pliny speaketh in the 2 book, chap. 29. and 58. Plutarch in Marius giveth to Aëtius the orname Marius. This C. Cato is the brother of that M. Cato, who four years before was Conul, nephew to M. Cato Confiilurum, and Africanus hates his son, as faith Vellicinius, Cicero against Verres, and in Brutus.

C. Cælius, Cn. Papreus.

Caßodorus and Olisiponens let down for next Conulis, C. Cælius and Cn. Papreus. The Sicilian catalogue Metellus and Carbo. Entropius, C. Cælius Metellus, and Cn. Carbo. These men Tacitus in his book of the manners of Germans reported to have born the Conulhip, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome in which, both he and Olisiponens do report, that the people of Rome began first to war with the Cimmerians and the Teutones. This C. Metellus was the fourth son of C. Metellus the son of Macedoniens; whom, when he died, he left a man of Pretors calling, and in fait and election for to be Conul. This man garner a surname by way of reproach, as Cicero teetitheth in his second book of a perfect Orator. Now hisnameth he Capreus, as Plutarch faith in the Life of the Romans.

M. Livius Drusus. L. Piso.

Caßodorus exhibeth unto us for this years Conulis, M. Livius Drusus, and L. Piso. The Sicilian catalogue Drusus and Piso. L. Piso sumed Cæsarius: a man of Conuliar degree was then alter by the Tigurins, when Lu. Cæsion was Conul, as Oration teetitheth.

643

Q. Metellus. M. Silanus.
Cassiodorus faith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silanus. The Sicilian catalogue theweth Metellus and Silanus, Pedianus and Eutropius, Q. Caecilius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Junius Silanus. Of them also Cicero speaketh in Brutus. This Metellus was furnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velvius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens deliver for the Consuls of this year, Servutus Galba and M. Scarus. The Sicilian evendces, Sulpius and Scarus. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, faith that S. Galba wasa man of Consul degree, when Marcus was the fix time Conful. Of M. Scarus the Conful, Velvius and Tacio make mention. This is that M. Arelitus Scarus, who being afterwards in embattale was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threecore and sevent Epitome.

I. Cassius. C. Marius.
Cassiodorus joineth in the conquesthip this year, I. Cassius and C. Marius. Cassinian book and the Sicilian records. Longinus and and Marius, Pliny also make mention of them in his 1:0 book and 1:8 chap. Cicero in his oration for Plancus: Plutarch in Marius; and Cicero again in his third book of Duties, witteth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twice for the office of Edileship, was created Conful.

Q. Servilius Capio. C. Atillius.
Obsequens and Cassiodorus match consuls together this year, Q. Servilius Capio and C. Atillius Scarrus. The Sicilian monuments Capio and Scarus. In this yean upon the third day of January, M. Tiullius Cicero was born, as Celsus in his fiftteenth book and eight and twentieth chap, hath left written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

P. Rutilius Rufus. C. Manlius.
Pllinius Erutius Rufus and C. Manlius, are put down by Obsequens and Cassiodorus for this years conuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the son of Marcus. About the other conful the Annals do vary and disagree: some forename him C. others C. Same name him M. Manlius others M. Marius or Manlius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in one at Puteoli: the inscriptions whereof testifyeth that P. Rutilius and Mn. Marius were Consuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian regissers, wherein it is Rufus and Manlius. Of this Manlius mention there is made in Cicero’s Orations for Plancins and Manius: likewise in Valerius, Salus, Tacius, Florus, Eutropius and Orosius. That he was not only a safe man and of low birth, but also without all verte and wit, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancins. Whereby it easily appeareth, that the Malii were a kinred different from the Manlii. For of C. Manlius a Patrician, and that of a molt noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

C. Marius II. C. Flavins Fimbrina.
The next Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus, C. Marius the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbrina: by Obsequens, C. Marius and C. Flavius. By the Sicilian regissers Marius and Fimbrina: by Pedianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbrina’s Item, C. Marius and Cane Flavius. Besides, Cicero, Velvius, Valerius, Plutarch, and others speake oftent of his Coff.

C. Marius III. C. Aurelius Orfeles.
Cassiodorus reporteth for this years Consuls, C. Marius the third time, and L. Aurelius Orfeles. The Sicilian catalogue Marius and Orfeles. Moreover, Marius even in his abilene was elected Consul the third time, for fear of the Cimbran war which was defeated, as Velvius, Eutropius, the Breviary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do testify.

C. Marius IV. Q. Lucatus.
Next after them are put down for Consuls by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, C. Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lucatus. The Sicilian regissers exhibit unto us Marius and Catullus, Plutarch and Eutropius. Cain Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lucatus Catullus. Of these Consuls, Cicero and Pliny oftentimes make mention.

C. Marius. V., M'. Aquilinus.

P.

C. Marius VI., L. Valerius Flaccus.

CaAedorus and Oftegens shew unto us for this years consuls, C. Marius the first time, and Lu, Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian records,

Marius and Flaccus. This L. Flaccus (afterwards Censor) was President of the Senate, and matter of the horiomen under Sylla Dictator.

Of these consuls Cicero speaketh very often, and namely, in his Brutus, in his oration for Rabirius, against Catiline and Antonius; and also in the defence of Flaccus. Plinylikewise in his second book, Velatiiu, and Pedanius upon the oration against Piso. Moreover, Plutarch, and many authors besides. In this year (upon the twelfth day of July, then called Quintilis, as Microbius witnesseth) was C. Caesar born, who afterwards was surnamed Dictator.

M. Antonius, A. Postumius.

Reported it is by Caesarodorus and Oftegens, that M. Antonius and A. Postumius were Conuls this year. The Sicilian regilifers, shew

Albinus and Antonius. In a fragment allo of the capitol marbles, mention there is of A.,

Postumius. Carthianian book and the Greek records, have Antonius and Albinus. Of these Conuls, Cicero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile.

Likewise, Pliny in his 8 book and 7 chap, where he noteth this the 655 year, Allo Celsus in his 4 book and 6 chap.

Q. Metellus, T. Didius.

Ullus Metellus and T. Didius succeeded

Conuls next year, as Caesarodorus and Oftegens do write. And Pedanius upon the oration for Cornelia, nameth them: Curio

(faithe he) accused Q. Metellus Nepos,ion of Batiocorus, and nephew of Macedonius, who was Conul with T. Didius. Cicero speaketh of the same man in his oration after his return.

C. Lentulus, P. Crassus.

Not only Caesarodorus, but the Sicilian regilers also, do tellith, that Cn. Lentulus and

P. Crassus were Conuls this year; and Of-geens nameth them, Cn. Cornelius and P. Lic-ninius. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and first chap, also in his 33 book and second

Cn. Domitius, C. Cassius.

This year had for Consuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Cassius, as Caesarodorus and Ofgegens do writeth. Cassius annals and the Greek regilers, shew Xeodarbus and L conjugis, A fragment of Per, Flaccus his marbles, Xeodarbus and C.

Cassius son of Lucius. Pedanius speaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

L. Crassus, Q. Scaviola

Lucius Crassus and Q. Scaviola were Conuls next following, according to Caesarodorus and Oftegens. In a fragment of the capitol records as touching Conuls, is to bee seen Crassus and Marius. In Consorinius, we find Lu, Licinius son of Lucius, Cicero in his Brutus writeth, that Crassus the orator bare all dignities of magistraty, together with Scaviola the high-priest, except the Tribunat of commons and the Cenforthip: also that whites they two were Conuls, Q. Hortensius pleaded the first cause that ever he understand, at the bar. Pedanius upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelia, maketh mention of L. Licinius Crassus the Orator, and

Q. Marius Scaviola the arch-bishof, an orator beides and a professed lawyer, both Conuls together.

C. Celsus, L. Domitius.

CaAedorus and Oftegens declare for this years Consuls, C. Celsus and L. Domitius, The Sicilian regilifers, Calidius and Xeodarbus. In a capitol fragment, they are Calidius and L. Domitius son of Cn. As for Calidius, it is the surname of Celsus. For Velatiiu maketh mention of one

C. Calidius, under Augustus. In like maner Cicero

in his book entituled, The king for a Conulship, and in his oration for Murena. Allo Pada-nus upon the Oration for Cornelia, Again,

Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before

Herenius.

C. Valerius Flaccus. M. Herennius.

There are marched by Caesarodorus and Ofgegens for conuls this year. C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flaccus and Herennius. A broken stone of the capitol, hath Flaccus and M. Herennius, Plinius in his 29 book and 3 chap, Cicero also in his Oration for Murena, and in Brutus, speaketh of

C. Claudius Pulcher, M. Perpenna.

Conuls this year, were C. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perpenna, as Kites Caius and Ossianus. Likewise in a capital broken monument, and in the Sicilian register, it is Pulcher and
M. Perpenna, Cicerone maketh mention of this Caius as Prior of Sicily in the fourth Oration against Peressus and as Edile Curule in his second book of Office. So doth Pliny in his 8 book.

L. Marcius. Sext. Iulius.

According to Cassiodorus and Ossianus, note for Conuls this year, L. Marcius and Sext. Iulius. The chapt, in like manner Cicero many times, and Valerius.

L. Flaminio. P. Ratius Lupus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, L. Portius and Cn. Pompeius, Padernus upon the Oration for Consuls, surmised Cn.
Caesar. The Capitol fragment threw no more but Strabo and dota. Appius hath made mention of these consuls;
so have Ossianus and others that have penned the Marian war. This Cn. Pompeius was fa-ter to that Cn. Pompeius the Great, as Appianum witnesseth, and Padernus upon the Oration against Piso.

L. Sulla. Q. Pompeius.

Cassiodorus setteth for this years Consuls, L. Sulla and Q. Pompeius: and the same is written in Ossianus, Vellius, En党的十九us Ossianus, Appius Vulcius, and others. The Sicilian records have Silla and Kullius, Sulla after his victory in the civil war; would needs have himself surmised Flamen, and therefore Padernus and the avouchers of the capitol monuments, in report-ting this consular, write thus: I, Sulla, who afswered with the name of Lucullus, and nephew of Plautus. Moreover of Q. Pompetius Rufus, Cicero maketh mention in his Br-tus.

Reported there are by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers for Consuls this year, L.
Cinna and Cn. Olivarius, Appius Volatus, and the rest who have recorded the history of this time, name them L. Cornelius Cinna, and Cn. Olivarius.
Plutarch writeth, that La, innows being the adverse faction to L. Sulla, was by him made con-ful, upon condition, that he should not cross nor stand against the proceeding of the said La.
Sulla, and to soon as he was entered into place of government, he began to trouble and disquiet the present state of the commonwealth, yes, and intended an action against Sulla, by the means of Virginius a Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sulla contemning Virginius, made an expedition against Mithridates.

L. Cinerinus II. C. Marcius VII.

A feast this year, were Consuls, C. Marcius the reventh time, and L. Cinna the second time, according to the records of Scllofys, C. Scissidiorus, and those who wrote of the civil war. Plutarch faith, that Marcius was the first man that was seven times consul of Rome. Moreover as is it to be read in Appius and in the Breviaries L. Cinerius and C. Marcius without any lawful assembly for Election, declared themselves Consuls against this year, and the very same day that they entered into their magislary M. Ascanius commanded Sex.
L. Licinius a Senator, to be thrown down from the rock Tarpeia: who after he had committed many hainous crimes and outrages, ended his dates upon the Ides of January: in whose room was subordained, L. Verr. Flaccus, even he (as men think) who before-time was colleague to C. Marcius in his first Consulship of whom Cici-nero maketh mention in his Oration for his son Placcus.

L. Cinerinus III. Cn. Papirius.

Cassiodorus witnesseth that the Consuls succeeding in this year, were L. Cinerius the third time, and Cn. Papirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinerius and Carbo. In the 83 Breviary it is written that Lu. Cinna and Cn. Papirius Carbo, for two years together usurped the Consulate.
Also in the book entitled Of famous perions, we read that Cinna made himself Consul a second and third time, of thee Consuls Plutarch speaketh in Sulla, Appius in Mithridatic, and in the first book of civil wars.

L. Cinerinus IV. Cn. Papirius II.

Next were Consuls, after Cassiodorus and the Epitomist, Lu. Cinna the fourth time, and and Cn. Papirius Carbo the second time. Cicero in his Tusculan questions mentioneth Cn., four times Conil: so doth Suetonius in Caius. And of Cn., Papirius Carbo twice Conil, the capital tables do yeeld testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for conil (not without fulmination of error) Carbo and Scribonius.

L. Scipio. C. Norbanus.

Eedles the Sicilian tables, Caffiodorus, Obseq tient, Appius, Velleius, Florus, and Tacit us in his nineteenth book do witness, that Lu.
Scipio, and C. Norbanus were Conils. In the capital fragments it is written, Lu. Cornelius son of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Aetacian.

M. Carinus. Cn. Carbo III.

I find in Caffiodorus, Appius, Velleius, and oth ers, the next conill to have been C. Mar inus and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C.
Marinus was the brothers son of C. Marini seven times conil, according to Appius: but Vellei us, Plutarch, Florus, and others, say, that he was the son of that C. Marini and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marini.
Certainly, in the capital tables, he is called C.
Marinus, son of C. and nephew of Cnus. Cicero spokeath of the Cn. against Rutus: Pliny also in his 17 book and they who have set down in writing the civil wars of Sulla.

Next to those, Caffiodorus bringeth in for coni lus, M. Tullius and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decius and Dolabella. Appius also reporteth, that Sulla Dictator, to the end that the flat and common-weal might seem to retain some flew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M. Tullius and Cornelius De cubitus to be created conils, whilst himself af ter the manner of Kaste aloft in a throne above them. Cicero in his oration against Rutus, and Celsius in his 15 book and 33 chap, maketh mention of M. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius coni uls. In a capital fragment, this M. Tullius son of M. nephew of A., is surnamed Decius.

L. Sulla II. Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian reggizites, let down for Conils, Lu. Sulla the second time, and Q. Metellus. Appius laith moreover, that Sull.
na Dictator though he was, yet hold content and willing to be declared conil with Q. Met ellus Pontius, to the end that the common-weal might seem to have some likenes yet of a free state. Of these conils, Cicero maketh mention in his Orations against Verres, and elsewhere.
Celsius likewise in his 15 book and 28 chapter, together with Caffiodorus. This Metellus was surnamed Pontius. He it is, who was by lot ap pointed to manage the wars in Spain and ag against Servius: and lou he was to Namicais.

675

T he next conils were P. Servilius and Ap. Cla udiantus, as witnesseth Caius. In the Sicilian tables it appeareth that their surnames were,
Pana and Pulex: of whom Appius writeth thus: The people of Rome in malevoli ous manner to court Sull. the Dictator, reques ted of him that he would continue conil till another year. But Sulla would none of that: and took order, that Sen. Ifurinus and C. Mar ius Pulcher, should be declared Conil. In a frag ment of the capital he is thus written: P. Servi lus Vatia, called afterward Flaviius: whch surn name he took of the Iatarians, a nation in his whom he subdied. My authors are. Pana nus upon the Orations of Cicero against Verci Stabro in his 14 book; Marcellinus likewise in his 14 book, with others.

M. Lepidus. Q. Catus.

M. Lepidus and Q. Catus are by Casi dorius named Conils for this year. Plut.
arch reporteth that when L. Sulla had given up his Dictatorship and restored again to the peo ple of Rome the free liberty to dispole of consu lar dignities in their solemn assemblies for elec tions; M. Lep did an enemy to Silla, and an audacious person, was declared Conil be to Catus, and had the preheminence above him, by the earnest endeavours of Cn. Pompeius.
Of the Cn. Conils, Pliny maketh mention in his 36 book, wherein he laith that they governed in the year 676. Likewise, Cicero in his Ora tion for Cornelius: Flow sour out of Egypt: Valerius a book 3 chap, and Europius.

M. Aemilius. D. Brutus.

T his year had for Consil by the testimony of Casi dorius and Obseqient, M. Aemilius and D.
Brutus, Macro a Tribune of the com mons, spakeath of them in Salust, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppre fed. In like fort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his se cond book of Duties, as also Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chap. This M. Aemilius was sur named Lepidus and Livius; for out of the fami ly of Livius he was adoptid by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, son of Ma mercos.

Cn. Octavius. C. Carro.

Errinis Flaccus setteth down for Consil; Cn.
Octavius son of M. nephew of C. and C.
Scribonius Carro. The same doth Cerro report in Brutus. So do Salust. Obsequens, Livius, in his first book; and Pliny in his second book and
and 35 chapter. Cic, in his Brutus, and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chap. make report of three Cat Censoris, all our Orator to wit, the father, the son, and the sons son or nephew.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, L. Olivarius and C. Cotta. Obsequens, C. Aurelius and L. Olivarius. Pliny in his second book and 37 chap. Cicero likewise in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Olivarius, and C. Aurelius consuls. Upon the broken marbles of the Capitol, they stand to be seen, L. Olivarius son of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Aurelius. This year the Sicilian registers over-skip, Paddius writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta’s brethren, and all of consular degree, namely, Catius, Marcus, and Lucius.

For this years consuls, Cassiodorus registreth L. Lucullus and M. Cotta. The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta, Eutropius, Appianus in Historiastica, and Plutarch in Lucullus, name them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurelius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero against Verres; and by Florus in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was consul with A. Albinius, as Cicero and Plutarch do testify.

M. Lucullus. C. Cassius.

This year (by the testimony of Cassiodorus) had for consuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Cassius: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Cassius: whom Cicero in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Cassius: saying that the laws of Terränia and Cæsara were thereby promulged. For, so far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments, M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Eutropius nameith Roman gens by two siblers. That the surname of Cassius was Varrius, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterpont of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Cassius Varrius, a man who had been Consul, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

The consuls next following, by the report of Cassiodorus, were L. Cæsur and Cn. Lentulus. In like sort Cicero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and elsewhere. Plutarch also in Cæsaris, with Eutropius and Orosius. Cahpiian book showseth Poppicola and Lentulus. Now the surname of L. Cæsur was Poppicola, as witnessth Orosius.

Cn. Anfidius. P. Lentulus.

Anfidius sennaeth down for consuls this year, Cn. Anfidius, and P. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers have Lentulerus and Omphius. Eutropius, C. Lentulus and Cn. Anfidius Omphius. This Cn. Anfidius Omphius, when he went beside a Tribunship of the commons, was chosen consul, as Cicero writeth in his oration for Plantæus. This is that P. Lentulus turnmaed Sura, who afterwons, being a man of consular calling, and who had been twice Praetor, was hanged and strangled to death when Cicero was consul, for that he had confirited with Catullus: whose grand-father was P. Lentulus President of the Senate, as Cicero faith, pleading for his house, and inveighing against Catullus: as also Paddius.

Next to them were Cn. M. Cæsarius and Cn. Pompeius, according to Cassiodorus, Plutarch, Appian, and the Sicilian records. Their surnames for certain, were Verres and Magna. All the old writers speak much of this first consulship, Plutarch reporteth that L. Cæsarius attained to the Consular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consul. Besides, Cicero, Sallust, Paddius writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors speak of these consuls.

685

Q. Metellus. Q. Hortensius.

Then followed consuls, Q. Metellus and Q. Hortensius, as Cassiodorus and the Sicilian catalogues do testify, Paddius matcheth Q. Metellus with Q. Hortensius, that great Orator. Likewise, Josephus in his fourteenth book of Jewish antiquities, Cicero in Brutus calleth this Q. Hortensius, the son of Lucius, Q. Metellus, afterwards upon the conquest made of Crete furnamed Creteus, was the son of L. Dalmatian, as may be gathered out of Paddius upon the Oration of Tully [called Divinarit] against Verres.

L. Metellus. Q. Marcianus.

Pæadius writing upon Tullus Oration against Piso; Dio likewise and Cassiodorus, join together in the consulship this year, L. Cæsarius Metellus, and Q. Marcianus. The Greek records, Marcianus Rex, and Metellus this Metallus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magistracy: that he also who was substitutted in his room, left this life before he entred into the government: and therupon it was not thought good to infeble any more: and by that means Q. Marcianus bare that dignity alone: and him Sallust entitleth with the surname of Rex. This L. Metellus was brother to Q. Creutius, as Paddius witnesseth.

The Conuls elect, were L. Antonius Patro (as it appeareth upon a monument of a triumph in the capitol, and not Antonius, as commonly it is read) and P. Cornelius Sulla: who being condemned for ambitious seeking after that office, and having therefore suffered, condign punishment, their accusers step into their place of government, namely, L. Aurelius son of Marcus, surnamed Cassius; and L. Manuel son of Lucius, surnamed also Torquatus: as tellit Salas, Dio, Pedian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which he made in his white robe: and lastly, Tranquillus in Caesar.

The year next ensuing had for Conuls, by the testimony of Cassiodore, Pedianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Cesar and C. Figulus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Cesar, and Lucius Martius son of Caius, surnamed Figulus, Cicero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figulus: so doth Salas in Catilina. This, L. Julius Cesar is his son who was Conul in the Marian war.

Here the Conuls this year, were M. Tullius son of M. surnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius son of M. as tellity Dio in his seven and thirtieth book, Cassiodore, Salas in his Catilinian oration, Vitellius in his second book, Joseph in his Jewish antiquities 1 4 book 8 chapter. Plant in his eight book and three and fifteenth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of A. gusitus, Appian, Eurpomius, Pedian, and others.

Here followed Conuls next, D. Silanus and L. Muraus, as Cassiodore, salebo, and the Sicilian records do witness. Dio calleth them D. Junius son of M. surnamed Silanus and L. Licinius son of L. surnamed Muraus, Emprius nameth them D. Junius Silanus and L. Licinius, son of that L. Muraus who in quality of Pro-prector triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero saith) pleading for Muraus himself, being accused and in trouble for unlawful seeking to be Con. In this assembly for election of Con. L. Sergius Caelius suffered the second repulse: for anger thereof; in a melancholy he brake out into a conspiracy, and practised against the state: and likewise Servius Sulpillius Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Muraus for the crime afofoled.

Q. Metellus, Q. Afranius.

Cassiodore and the Sicilian regifiers nominate for this years Conuls, Q. Metellus and L. Afranius. The like doth Obsequens and Cicero in his first book of Epistles to Atticus, Dio nameth them L. Afranius son of L. and Q. Cassidus of Q. surnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Contulate (as Dio witneseth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had been both twain his Lieutenants serving under him in Afia.

M. Cesar, M. Bibulus.

Cassiodore, Sustanius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do much together for consuls this year, C. Cesar and M. Bibulus, Dio, C. Julius son of C. Cesar and M. Calpurnius, Plutarch and Appius, C. Julius Cesar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appian as also Eupomius and Orosius give Bibulus the forename of Lucius. Of Cesar and Bibulus, Cicero speakseth in his first book of Epicles, writing to Lucullus.
Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records shew for Confuls this year, L. Piso and A. Gabinius, Dio, L. Calpurnius of L. Piso: and A. Galba us son of Aulus, Cæsar, Cicer, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, L. Piso, and A. Gabinius, Cæsar wrote of them in his first book of the Gaul war, and Plutarch in the life of Cæsare the younger.
Cicero also in his oration against Piso and for Sextius. This Piso the Conful Cicero and Padian surnamed Cæsorius, for so his grand-father before him was called, as appeareth in the capitol records for the year 666.

P. Lentulus.  Q. Metellus.

The Confuls following for this year, were by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records, P.
Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Spinther and Q. Cacelius son of Q. Metelius Nepos. Of them speake-thek Valerius in his ninth book, Lentulus (ed.
he) and Metellus companions in the confulfhip were beheld and feen both upon the stage like plaiers: but the one of them took the surname of Spinther. One of the second sort of actors:
the other, but that he had gotten the name of Nepos already for his lewd behaviour, should have been called Pamphilus, after the name of one of a third sort, whom for all the world he resembled. Of the same men, Cicero in his first book of Epitites, and in very many of his orattions, Pliny also in his seventh book and second chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

Cn. Lentulus. L. Philippus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Confuls, Cn.
Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Ph. Eupemph, Dio, Cn.
Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L. Marcellus son of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and M. Marcellus Confis, Cicero speaketh in his Epitites to Lentulus. Plutarch also in the life of Cato, maketh mention of Marcellus Philippus now Confis, This Cn. Lentulus was the fon of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero faith in his Brutus, And surnamed he was Marcellus, and not Claudius, that it might be known of what family of the Claudii he was defended.

696

When as by the obstinate perfitance of C.
Cato Tribun of the commons, (who ever interpoted his negative) there could be no ordinary assembly holden for the creation of magistrates, the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of grief: so as upon an interregency between Cn. Pompeius was chosen Conful, and with him M. Crassus the second time, as Plutarch, Dio, and Appian do witness. Lucius Domittius Enobarbus, whom Caio and all good men accompanied and pre-seated, was in the common place by violence throughly beaten, and Cæsare himself wounded.
These Cæsare in pamphlet, ion of Cn. Magnus the second time: and M. Licinins son of Publius Crassus, the second time. Of them Padianys, Entropius, the Sicilian register and others make mention.

Dio in his nine and thirtieth book, for the year after the cities foundation 700, fol-owing the computation of Varro, avoucheth Confils, Appius Claudius, son of Appius Pulcher: and L. Domittius, son of Cereus, Enobarbus, Cassiodore and Obsequens, name them. Ap.
Claudius and L. Domittius, whom the Sicilian records call Pulcher and Enobarbus: and Padian upon the Oration for Scamurus, L. Domittius Enobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domittius, Ion of Cereus Enobarbus, Cicero speaketh in the eight book of Ciceros Epitites.
When by reason of the contentions among the mighty competitors, the Consuls could not be created by the Calends of January; there pallied an Act of the Senate, according to the mind and advice of Bibulus, by virtue whereof, C. Pompeius was by the Interegent Servo, Sulpius created Consul the third time, upon the fifth and twentieth of February, without a Collegium first, and presently entered upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envy that might arise thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Consulship for the five last months of the year behind, Q. Catullus, Pius, Metellus Scipio, his wives father. Thus writeth Tadius upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of Milo, Plutarch likewise, Appianus and Dio. This Metellus Pius Scipio was also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, son of Nasica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Metellus Pius, is called by Cicero in the familiar Epistles of Cicero, Q. Catullus on Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

M. Marcellus, Sen, Sulpius,

Against this year were Consuls created, M. Marcellus, and Servo, Sulpius, as Caiffodorus, Plutarch, and Appianus witness. The Sicilian records call them Rufus and Marcellus, Dio nameth them Servo Sulpius Seneca, son of Nasica Scipio, which being adopted by Q. Metellus Pius, is called by Cicero in the familiar Epistles of Cicero, Q. Catullus, son of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

L. Paulus, C. Marcellus,

Here succeeded Consuls, L. Paulus, and C. Marcellus, witnesses Caiffodorus, Dio, Strabo, Florus, Historian in his 8 book, together with the Sicilian records. The one of these is by Do named L. Emilius, son of Marcus, Junius Pardinus the other by Cicero in his Epistles, C. Cæcilius, son of Cæcilius, Marcellus, Do writeth that this man by some was reported to be the brother, i.e. the brothers son, others another brother of Mar, Marcellus, but Suetonius faith plainly, he was the brothers son.

L. Lentulus, C. Marcellus,

Caiffodorus setteth down for Consul this year L. Lentulus & C. Marcellus, as also Appian, Plutarch, Historian, Florus, and Cicero in his Epistles do teellifie, Do call eth theie Consuls

Lu. Cornelas, son of Publius Lenolus, and C. Claudius, son of Marcus Marcellus, in the broken marbles of the Capitol it is to be seen thus, C. Claudius, son of Marcus, nephew of Marcus Metellus. This is that Lucius Lenolus Cænus, who as Calus teellifie in the former election took a repulse, and by Cicerone is called in the Oration against Patiens, Flamen Martialis.

C. Cæsar, P. Servilus,

When Cæsar Cæsar the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election in the latter end of the former year, Consuls there were created Caius Julius, son of Caius Cæsar, and Publius Servilus, son of Publius Servilus. For now was the year come, when as Cæsare by the laws might be chosen Consul; for in the third book of his own Commentaries he faith himself, and in Dio in his one and sixtieth book, Plutarch, Triumviri, Appianus, and Caiffodorus do teellifie of him, but he meaneth that law which expressly forbade and debarred, that no man might be within ten years space chosen Cof, twice. As for Publius Servilus, he was the son of that Publius Servilus that first took the surname Servilus, who this year bare his Consulship at Rome, while Cæsar warred in Macedonia.

Q. Fufius Calenus, P. Vatinius,

Do faith, That the people of Rome, having intelligence that Pompeius was murdered, endeavoured earnestly, that there might palls as honourable decrees for Cæsar the conqueror as possible might be. And therefore they ordained, that he might be Conful five years together, and Dictator not for six months as before-time, but a whole year and a half, and the Tribunes authority for ever. Now Cæsar, albe it he was without Italy, immediately entered upon his Dictatorship, having sub-ordined under him for his General of the horie, Mar. Antonius, a man who yet had not been Praetor. This appeareth by the Capitol records, Dio, Plutarch, and Cicero in his second Philippus. But under what pretence and colour Cæsar took upon him this Dictatorship and the reth following, Marcus Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Cæsar prdlte in Dio: wherein he faith, that Cæsar was created Dictator to make head against the enemies and therefore the troubles and difficulties of war was the cause of this creation. But certain it is that Cæsar became Dictator for another cause, namely that by the means of that sovereign power, he might draw unto himself alone the whole managing and government of the State, whitherforetime had been administered by many persons, but Do addeth moreover and faith, that in the beginning of this year there were neither Praetors nor Consuls elected. For Marcus Antonius, General of the horie, arrayed in his purple robes, with six Lictors, making way before him, resembled a certain Certain knew of the ancient liberty. But within a while after he departed forth of the City, and that which never was before done by any Master of the horse, he left Lu. Cesar an aged man, Provolt and governor of Rome, Hovbeir, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conquest of Egypt, when King Ptolomeus was slain, and Pharmaces K. of Ptolemais vanquished; Conuls were created, Q. Enibus, son of Quintus, Cateler; and Pub. Vatinius, son of Publius. And the Capitoll tables do shew, and Caiusbrus also, Of Publius Vatinius Conul, Macrobius in his second book make mention.

Verrinis in his capitoll tables letteth forth Conuls of this year, only without ever a Dictator. Tho stone record of Catarius, whereof Ompharion speakeheth hither, nameth C. Julius Cesar the third time, and M. Enibus Lepidus. But Dio in his three and fourtieth book, the last year following (quoth he) he bare the Dictatorship and the Conulat both, the third time, and took unto him for his College in both Magistracies, M. Enibus Lepidus. Of the same mind feemeth Tragullus to be in Cesar, chap. seventy fix. Likewise Hirtius in the first book. But Ompharion supposeth that both Tragullus and Dio, and Hirtius also was in an error. For with the capitoll records, Plutarch and Eutropius agree; who write that Cesar this year was Conul the third time with M. Lepidus, and Dictator the second time.

C. Cesar. Q. Maximus.

They who cut the capitol marbles, do shew unto us that Cesar this year was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horse. From whom Dio different; who doth report that this year Cesar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus second time Master of the horse: also that Lepidus follow Conul with Cesar, declare himself again against all law, General of the horse, thus much of the Dictator. But asking the Conuls this year, there is to be written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same year Cesar bare his fourth Dictatorship, and likewise his fourth Conulat without College. In that history also it appeareth, that Cesar pretently entered upon his fourth Conulat, but bare it not throughout the whole year: and that so soon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he resigned and substituted in his place for the rest of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Qn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Cesar was the fourth time Conul, and that without College; as Sigerius maketh interpretation. For Cuphius, Kalender, together with the Sicilian regifiers, do shew that Cesar was Conul now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Cesar, who being Conul the first from the fourth time led an army into Spain. As for Q. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three months Conul. Dio faith moreover, that Cesar upon the death of Q. Fabius the Conul, declared the very last day of the year, C. Cauinus to be the Conul for those few hours that were behind. Whereof Cicero in his seventh book of Epitites, writing to Cn. Macrobius in his second book of Suetonius, Tacitus in his eighteenth book, Pliny in his seventh, and Suetonius in Caesar do make report.

C. Cesar. M. Antonius.

To feteth down for this year Cesar Dictator the first time, together with M. Enibus Lepidus Master of the horsemen, but the capitoll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time, Dio and Appian write that he created himself Conul together with M. Antonius. Likewise Caiusbras and the Sicilian regifiers give record, that Cesar was this year Conul the first time, together with M. Antonius, and Macrobius in his first book speaketh of them. Moreover, written it is in the capitoll and Colotitian tables, that Cesar was Co, the first time, with M. Antonius of M, and that in the room of Cesar there was chosen P. Cornelian of Publius. And this was P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Cesar himself (if he had lived) meant to have substituted in his own room, Plutarch writeth that Cesar Conul now the first time took unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have subordained Dolabella in his own stead, Antonius gavemeth it in an oration: and afterwards, when Cesar a second time would have had Dolabella to be declared Conul, and still Antonius crostled and withholdit, Cesar gave over his enterprise. But after Cesar was murdred, Antonius (as Dio writeth) yearing some infraction and commotion if he should have rejected Dolabella, took him into the fellowship of government, Appian writeth, that immediately after Cesar was killed, Dolabella entered into the Magistracy. So faith Phelimumallo. And this verily was the year, in which the conspiracy was contrived against Cesar, whereof the captains were M. and Decimus both Brutis, C. Trebonius & C. Cassius: and upon the fifteenth day of March, when he sat in Councill together with the senator in the court of Pompey, he was stabbed, and received in his body three and twenty wounds: which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat feigned the capitoll. And C. Olavius, his nephew or ferssion, whom Cesar had made in his will his half-heir, and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither Cesar had sent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took upon him the name of Cesar, according to his last will and testament.

The Chronologie

L.Celius, M.Caecilius.

C Afdadurs nameth for Conulis this year, L.Gellius and M.Caecilius. The Sicilian records these Publica & Nervos: Dio hath Lu. Gellius son of Lucius Poppæus, and M.Caecilius Nervus. Out of the capitol fragments it appeareth, that L.Gellius was the son of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this Lu. Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Messala. For it is the same man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus: whereby it may be understood, that Poppæus was his surname by way of adoption: for they were not the Gellus but the Valerii, that carried the surname of Publicola. The same fragments do shew, that the said Gellius left his place, and that another was put in his room. And haply it was L. Menatius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Planus: whom Pliny in his thirtieth book and third chapter, saith to have been twice Conulis: but in what year he was the second time, a man cannot find, unless it were in this.

719
Sex. Pompeius. L.Cornificius.

C Afsodorus and the Sicilian records testify, that this year Conulis were Sex. Pompeius and L.Cornificius. Dio L.Cornificius son of Lucius, and Sextus Pompeius son of Sexius. This year Sex. Pompeius son of Consus was slain.

M. Antonius. L.Scribonius Libo.

C Afsodorus putteth down for Conulis, Lu. Scribonius and Lu. Arratius. The Sicilian catalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius son of Marcus the second time, and L. Scribonius son of Lucius Libo. The same Dio faith moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Calends of January gave over the Magistracy, and subscribed in his own stead Lu. Scribonius Arratius: and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Arratius that was Conulis this year with Libo. That Conulis also were sub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in some authors that have set forth the Municipal Annals. And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Amphilus Conulis, for one part of the year, and that he built a statytkon or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Conulsiphip.

C.Caspar. L.Volatclus.

C Afsodorus exhibeth unto us for Conulis, C.Caspar and L.Volatclus. Dio, Caspar the second time, and L.Volatclus son of Lucius Tullus. They who composed and digested the Sicilian registers, very untily set down Cæsar and Cicero for this years Conulis. Of this Conulsiphip of Cæsar, Suetonius and Dio speak, saying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius also beforehand. Instead of Cæsar was Lu. Antonius subrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book enuited, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Emperor Cæsar II, L.Volatclus.
Kal. Januarti, L.Antonius.
Kal. Maii, L.Volatclus.
C. Fonteius.
Kal. Sept., L. Vinicius.
Of L. Volatclus made Conulis by M. Antonius: and depoed Dio likewise maketh mention.

C.Caspar II, L. Messala.

C Afsodorus quamctheth for Conulis this year C. Cæsar the second time, and L. Messala. The Sicilian registers Ottavius and Cornicius, Dio Cæsar the third time, and M. Valerius son of Marcus, named Messala Corvinus, and that right truly. For Cæsodorus maketh no reckoning of that Conulsiphip of Cæsar which he bare with Pedius: because he was subordinated in the place with another. But Dio and Appius do writeth, that Cæsar and Antony were marched together this year, both of them in their second Conulsiphip, at that time as upon peace made with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Conulis beforehand for eight years next ensuing: howbeit in the first year the people turned Antony out of his Conulsiphip, and proclaimed war against him and Cleopatra, and in his place was Marcus, Messala declared Conulis. As touching the Conulis this year subordinate, thus we find written in the ancient inscriptions:

Emperor Cæsar III, M.Valerius.

C. Cæsar III. M. Crausus.

C Afsodorus nameth for this years Conulis, C. Cæsar the third time, and M. Crausus. The Sicilian records Ostienus and Crausus. Dio, Cæsar the fourth time and M.Licinius son of Marcus, Crausus. He added moreover, and faith, Caesar in the midst of that water crossed the seas out of Macedon into Italy, wherein he was the fourth time Consul with M. Crassus. Or at this time, that Caesar called Emperor, was Caesar the fourth time, with M. Crassus. Of other Consuls substituted after M. Licinius, this we find in the old inscriptions. Emperor Caesar W, M. Licinius. Cal. Jul. C. Antistius. Ibid, Septembr. M. Tullius. Cal. Novembr. L. Scaius.

Of M. Tullius Consul with Augustus, Dio maketh mention in his history of this years acts, Pliny also in his 22 book and 6 chap, and Plutarch in Cleopatra, By Velius and Tacitus it appeareth that Augustus had this for addition the lifetime of Venus and Senius of Sabinus.

C. Caesar III. Sex. Apuleius.

In C. Caesar the four time, and Sex. Apuleius, In Dio, C. Caesar the fifth time, and Sex. Apuleius ion of Sexi. In the Sicilian records, Ovidianus and Apuleius: in the Antiquite inscriptions, Emperor C. Caesar the fifth time, and Sex. Apuleius. Dio saith, this was the year 725 from the foundation of the City. Of Caesar five times Consul, there is to be seen an old Epigram or inscription in this manner.

C. Caesar V. M. Agrippa II.

C. Caesar declared for Consul this year, C. Caesar the fifth time, and M. Agrippa the second time. Ovidianus and the Sicilian records, C. Caesar the fifth time, and Agrippa the second time, Dio, C. Caesar the fifth time, and M. Silanus. Agrippa: the third time: but it is to be read the second time, as Sibyllus advírteth, so as the next year it should be written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the supercription of that Temple (which he erected and named Pateron) in this form, [M. Agrippa son of L. third time Consul built it.] For Dio saith, that this Temple was finished two years after that he was Consul with C. Caesar the seventh time, in which year himself bare his third Consulship, and not the fourth. For otherwise in the front of the said Temple, he would have written, Consul the fourth time.

C. Caesar VI. M. Agrippa III.

C. Caesar, saith, that the next Consul were Cesar the first time, and Mar. Agrippa the third time. But Dio, Cesar the seventh time, and Agrippa the fourth time. But what is to be thought of them both, is evident by that which hath been said before. In the Sicilian registers verily it is written Ovidianus the seventh time, and Agrippa the third time.

C. Augustus cesar VII. T. Statilius.

C. Augustus puttesth down for Consul, C. Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and T. Statilius. The Sicilian monuments, Ovidianus the eighth time, and Titus. Dio, C. Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and Statilius Taurus the second time. For he had been Consul first, for a part of the year, anno 727, and now is the second time of whom Suetonius writeth thus in Nero; Nero took to wife Statilia Messilia, daughter (in the fourth decease) of Taurus, one who had been twice Consul, and also triumphant: he writeth also, that Augustus entered upon his eight and ninth Consular at Taracum.

C. Caesar Augustus VIII. M. Silanus.

C. Augustus theweth for Consul next, C. Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and M. Silanus. Dio and the Sicilian records, Augustus the ninth time, and M. Silanus, A fragment of the capitol, Emperor C. Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silanus. This year Augustus Cesar was Emperor the eight time, and first up the Temple of Janus the fourth time now that ever it was shut: which he had set open before in regard of certain wars, as Dio reporteth.

C. Cesar Augustus IX. c. Norbanus.

C. Augustus puttesth down for this years Consul, C. Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian registers, Augustus: he tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio, and a fragment of the capitol marble, Augustus the tenth time, and C. Norbanus Flaccus. This Norbanus seemeth to be the fom of C. Norbanus the Consul, anno 716, for he had not the numeral note testifying a second Consulship.

C. Cesar Augustus X. Cn. Piso.

C. Augustus letteth down for Consul, C. Caesar Augustus the tenth time, and Cn. Piso. The Sicilian records, Augustus the eleventh time, and Piso. And Dio, Augustus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius, son of Cn. Piso. By a fragment of the capitol itone it appeareth that Augustus entered the Consulship the eleventh time, together with Ambus Terentius Varro Murmora: also that Murmora died in his Magistracy, in whole head was elected Cn. Calpurnius Piso and Augustus went out of his government. Of which matter Dio thus writeth: Augustus went to the Alban Hills, and there refused up.
the Consulship. For whereas both he himself and many others, ever since the time that the C.W. was set in frame and established, had been the yearly Magistrates, he thought that from hence forwards he was to forbear the same; to the end, that the honourable dignity of Consul should be open to as many as might be. And this did he without the City, because he would not be hindered and letted in the Senate: and therewith subsidized in his place Lucius Sulpicius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brutus, who also wrote of his praises and commendable parts.

732 M. Marcellus, L. Arruntius.

This year had for Consuls, as faith Cestodorus, M. Marcellus and L. Arruntius: as Dio, M. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus and Aemilius son of Lucius. In the Capitol stone these Consuls are thus set down, L. Arruntius son of L., nephew of L. M. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to understand, that in the Sicilian records the Consuls are not well put down to be C. and A. in the twelfth time and Arruntius. In this year, the conspiracy of Fannius Capio and Varro Murex against Augustus was discovered: and the Temple of thundering Jupiter was dedicated, witness Dio.

733 M. Lollius. L. Lepidus.

The Colitian stone and Cassidorus shew for this year Consuls. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Lollius, Dio writeth, when Augustus was in Sicily: and the people of Rome at the assembly for Consuls election, there was a federation and commination. For M. Lollius only entered upon the government, by reason that the other place was reserved and kept for Augustus; but when he made reinsall, L. Lepidus was created, Of these Consuls Herace in his first book on Epistles writeth thus:

Me quaeque undas secat inlegiste Decembers, Colegami Lepidum quo dixit Lollius auro.

Know he, that 40 winters old and four, I was that year, At Rome when Consul Lollius, chose Lepidus his heir.

734 M. Apuleius. P. Silus.

After Cassidorus, the Consuls that followed for this year, were M. Apuleius and P. Silus. But in Dio, M. Apuleius son of Sextus and Publius Silus son of Publius Nerus. In the Sicilian records, Apuleius and Nerus.

735 C. Senius. L. Lucerinus.

The Colitian stone, Epiphanius in his treatise of Times, Dio and Cassiodorus set forth as Consuls this year, Caius Senini, son of Cains, Susenninus and Quintus Lucretius son of Quintus Pipa.

Of this year consuls thus writeth Dio, Caius Senius was declared Consul: but for that there was to be given him a Companion, and Augustus thought the second place of Consulship reserved for him, there were a revision, until Augustus pronounced Consul Quintus Lucretius one of the Embassadors, whom the Senate had sent unto him about the appearing of the foresaid edition; and with landing he was a man in times past proscribed, and outlawed. The same writeth Plutarch in the second book. In the broken Colitian stone it is to read, that the Consul elected instead of Sextus Saturninus, was Marcus Ventidius of Marcus Tullius: unto Plutarch and his soneth as Colleague, Agrippa. In this year, after the first ten years were expired, for which space Augustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Centaurian authority and dignity, he was created a second time by the people, over four of men's behaviour for the term of five years; and renewed the Consular power for the same time, and the Consular authority for ever. So as, at all times and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and he allowed to take his place and sit with the Consuls.

736 C. Lentulus, P. Lentulus.

Putilus Cornelius son of Publicius Lentulus Marcellus: and Cn. Cornelius son of Lucius, are set down for Consuls by the Colitian stone table; by Dio also and Cassidorus. In this year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperor C. after Augustus, obtained of the Senate and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five years.

737 C. Furnius, C. Silanus.

Here succeeded Consuls next, according to Cassidorus, Furnius and C. Silanus; after Dio, C. Furnius on C. and C. Junius son of Cains Silanus. But in the Colitian fragment C. Furnius on Cains, and C. Junius, whereas C. Furnius and C. Junius Silanus were Consuls, the solemn places, called Sculptures were now the fit time let out by Augustus, as Censorius and Dio affirm.

738 L. Domitius. P. Scipio.

Cassidorus nameth for Consuls Lucius Domitius and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Eubulbus and Cornelius, Dio, L. Domitius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, Eubulbus: and P. Cornelius son of P. nephew of Publius, Scipio: in like manner the Colitian table, wherein it standeth, that for P. Cornelius there was substituted L.Tau, i.e., Tarvisius of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and seventh chapter writeth thus, L.Tarvisius Rufus, a man most base for his parentage; parentage, delivered a Consul under Augustus. Cæsar of happy memory, only for his military service. In this Consul was the Quinquennial solemnity performed, as writeth Dio, in memorial of the Empire of Augustus and Agrippa one of the Quindecentur, had the ordering and letting out thereof.

M. Drausus, L. Piso.

The Consuls next following, were M. Drausus and L. Piso, as Cæsiodorus saith. The Sicilian regissers name them Libo and Piso, Dio, M. Lorimus son of Lucius, Draus Libo; and L. Calphurnius son of Marcus Piso, as Drausus son of Marcusus, &c., according to the Colonian fragment.

741
Ca. Lentulus, M. Crassus.

This year next following, had for Consuls, after Cæsiodorus and the Sicilian monuments, Ca. Lentulus and M. Crassus: whom Dio calleth, M. Licinius son of Marcus Crassus; and Ca. Cornelius son of Quintus Lentulus. The Colonian fragment saith, Marcus Licinius son of Marcus.

T. Nero, Q. Quintilis.

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quintilis were Consuls this year, as Cæsiodorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varus, in the Sicilian Catalogue. And Dio calleth them Titus Claudius son of Tiberius Nero: and Q. Quintilis, son of Sextus Varus. The Colonian fragment, Tiberius Claudius son of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his first Consulship but a few days. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Augustus Cæsar's wives son, who after the death of Augustus, attained to the Empire, having been first by him adopted.

742
M. Messala, P. Sulpitius.

Cæsiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Messala and P. Sulpitius. The Sicilian records, Messala and Q. Quirinus, Dio, M. Velinius, son of Marcus, Messala Barbatus: and P. Sulpitius of Publius Quirinus: of whom, Suetonius in Claudius, and Tacitus in his second book write. Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Josephus in the seventeenth book of antiquities and first chapter, is said to have born the Consular dignity, and was Lieutenant in Syria. At which time, our Lord Jesus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, was born, of whom Saint Luke maketh mention, saying, This was the first enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus Preident and governor of Syria. After these Consuls, others were submitted in their place, as the Colonian stone sheweth, wherein it is thus read:

Pindarum quisquis fides eundem
Inle, ceravis opus Dedit, Naturam pennis C'.

With wings devis'd by Dèdus,
And grew'd with wax they fliè;
Who's to ftrive (O Tendis) with Pindar;
To match his Poetry.

And after,
Tendis (Anton) quotis in alis Nubium trabibus,
O Antonius so loft
As he doth mount the cloud's aloft.

The Chronologie

Drusus Nero; Titus Quintius,

Here succeeded Caesar, according to Cassiodorus, Drusus Nero, and T. Quintius, but after Drusus Claudia the son of Tiberius Drusus and Titus Quintius, son of Titus Crispinus, Drusus and Crispinus, by Cassiodorus Calender and the Sicilian annalists. This Drusus, brother of Tiberius Nero was Augustan Caesar, his wisest son, who being Cenius, died in Germany, and both he and his children had the surname of Germanicus, as Dio writes: which addition the Senate gave him the first of that Province, as Etacaetis, with the death of this Drusus, endured Lactantius histories: for thus it is written in the last Epitome, &c. Look in the said Breviary.

To the Reader.

I doubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Roman story above written, will presently grow into a liking of the very places, which hath afforded so many persons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voyage to Rome, only to see the river Tyber, those seven hills, and the monuments remaining of that famous city. The journey they have found, for may long and tedious; for expense of money heavy and chargeable; for hazard of religion, confidence and good manners, exceeding dangerous: for degenerate are the inhabitants now from that ancient people so devout, so virtuous, and correct, in old times. To satisfy the Readers in this behalf, and to avoid the peril of that travel, I thought it not amiss to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to represent unto their eye the Topography thereof, that is to say, the description of the places, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruins of those antique buildings, mentioned in the story aforesaid. And forsooth, as Bartholomew Marlianus hath herein taken pains, and made a Treatise thereof, in his own concept to be dedicated unto that noble Prince of famous memory, Francis the French King, the first (I take it) of that name: and for that these learned men, who left it bright in print, have thought good to adorn therewith, as a necessary dependant, the foresaid Treatise: if for my part, hoping strangled with the difficulties of the Alps, and in some sort overcomes them, crossed Rhone and the Po, passed over the hills Olympus and Eumus, and framed through the rough streights of Thermopylae and Tempe; then now I would not at my return to stick at the pleasant mount, Palatine, Capitoll, Aventine, &c., with the plains and valleys between, or the river Tyber and Mars field underneath them, beautified especially with such wares, Temples, triumphant Arches, glorious Palaces, Theatres, Circles, Columns, and Colofses, wonders of the world, And albeit I found Marlianus unhappily himself, and the book that went in his name much corrupt in the print yet by conference with other Authors, I have reformed the faults, and endeavoured that our English edition might in some measure be answerable to the Latin.

A Summary collected by John Bartholomew Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millain, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

The First Book.

The situation of the City.

Before we entripe to shew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortal gods; with the invocation of whom, the Poets are wont in every hand and difficult work, to lay their hill ground and make their entrance.

The Capitol hill, where it is broadest, exceedeth not 8° or 10° feet; in length it lyeth out toward the North-west 1500. It hath a point or wing on either side in fashion of a semicircle, and in compass containeth well near seven furlongs.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with four angles of unequal sides, containing 1200 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitoline hill: a second of 1500 foot, boundeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Caelius: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the lips or hill-places, called Circus Maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the second side thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Circus, to the utmost skirt of the hill Caelius, which boundeth toward the Subura, and taketh up in breadth 500 feet; but it lieth out in length almost a mile from both fronts, between the Capitol, the Forum, and the mount Caelius:—in like manner from the said mount Capitol and Palatine, Subura and the Esquiline, as far as to the Church of Saint Mercurialis. A second plain there is, under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which stretcheth out 500 foot from the mount it self, as far as to the Tyber; and anon over-against the valley from the crooked reach and course of the river, and the nook whereby the Aveunitue is divid'd from the Palatin, it spreadeth broader: but afterwards between the said hils it groweth narrow, until ye come to Calibus and the very gate Capena, where the Aveunitue is parted from Calibus only by the breadth of the street or high way. The length of this plain is likewise a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aveunitue; and on the left, Capitolin mount the Palatin, and Calibus.

Then followeth the mount Calibus (separate from the Palatin by a plain) resembling a pyramidal form of a spire, so as the base thereof containeth 500 foot near to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the same it is by the street Appia, left by the grand Ciqre, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad between Calibus and Calibus lying out in length 4 Statia, and within a while to the walls which joyn close to the mount Calibus, as far as to the gate Agnaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Statia, toward the Northeast. Hence from the walls meet afornt for the space of two Statiae, even to the gate Nasicia: from whence as they turn to the Northeast, it is parted from the Esfugia by the street Labicanas; and anon shewing it self afront near S. Marcellinus, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form it taketh in circuits about 2500 paces. Moreover the Calibus is enclosed within the said valley, the street Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the City walls, and hath in compasses well-near a mile.

The Aveunitue seemeth to contain two hils: the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from the Tyber along the walls, and round near the gate Heptiteris, is divided and cut with a crooked street-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirqre and the mount Calibus: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Calibus by the street Appia, until you come to the gate Capena: It had in compass 18 Statia as Downtown also taketh: and on the Southeast a molt spacious and large plain of 4 unequal sides: toward the South containing almost 6 Statia, Westward five, somewhat less Eastward, but toward the Tyber not above four.

The Esfugia on the South part is divided with the street Labicanas; on the Northwest, with the valley lying between Calibus, Palatinus, and it self; on the North-the Sevina: and from the Vimigala hill, the street called Paritius pareth it, until a man come to the bath of Diodorus. In circumference it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form; incomprehensibly Varrus (not without good reason) thinketh it two hills, and cuteth it into many parts.

The Quirinal hill on the West side regardeth the Quirinal having about a furlong space the plain Suburraly lying between: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Between the same hills there lyeth as it were 4 jugera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Esfugia along the wall of the City, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby the mountains are made even. The compass thereof taketh up two miles and an half; the form thereof is longwise, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable. The Quirinal mountain on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militiam] for the space of 4 Statia, over-looketh the levell plot of the City which lieth Westward: but on the right hand, (as clearly appeareth by what we have said,) it is opposite to the Viminatus on the third side Northward, for the space of 6 Statia, it lieth to the hill called [Nortulosum]: It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 jugera, reaching near to the gate Saleria: and in the whole compass it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it standeth without the old poermory of the city: for the space of 3 Statia, it beareth over the valley Marisia lying between it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flumentum to Collinas, a full mile more than any other sides. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Statia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculm, on the other side of Tyber: the one half thereof and not above, is contained within the walls from the Viminatus, for the space of 3 Statia, whereas it stretcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the walls, for the compass of five Statia.

Moreover, above the Viminatus there is a little hill of the same nature, which putheth forth two points like horns: the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent; the convexity or outward compass thereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plain and base plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeast side (or rather the North) comprehended a Diameter or race almost of 8 Statia, environed with the hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the West side, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover, by a fright and direct line being drawn for two Statia from the hill Hortulorum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Pincers of Domitian called Namuscinus; along the bank of Tyber, over against the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven sides, containing within it more than three miles: without which square is left the valley Martia, namely as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyberis: so as the break, draweth narrow-er fall into the gate Flaminia.

There refteth yet the Transtiberin region, which together with the Janiculum, taketh in compass about three miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channel of Tyberis.
The region (on which Rome was after built) Well of Tyber, a hundred and forty furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by confiant report) first inhabited. Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenopion the lion of Lycaon, came into the laid quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own use. In process of time the Pelasgians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines) until the Trojan war: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that seigioy and kingdom; Long time after, Saturn being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italy: where he taught Jovis the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the sicle: in regard of which good turn, he was freely feoffed by Jovis in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Jovis enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who forsook the city Pallantum (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Eumander, seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth; received of Fannus the Ko of the Aborigines, a portion of ground; built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Pallantum, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phanetians, and Eprians, by reason that Elys their native country was wafted before by Hercules, were by him brought a way into Italy, and they planted themselves up on the mount Saturnine. These men lived along time according to their own laws and customs, until they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one commonalty. Then taigned Latium the ion of Fannus, still intime as \\ ot the ion of Achaios, after the overthrow and final ruin of Ilums, after many adventures and much variety of fortune, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the instinct of the deities to K. Latium, whose daughter Lavinia he took to wife; and so was by Latins admitted into the society and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joined together, he called both nations by the name of Latins. Then was Fannus wareed upon by Turnus: for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused and affianced to him before. But Eneas won the victory, and in single combat flew Turnus. At that time also Latins died, and left his ion in law Eneas heir to the cown, certain years after was Eneas killed by Mercurius K. of the Tucans; and Aeneas his ion succeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alban: and when he departed this life, made over the cown to his brother Sicyon. After him followed Kings, Eneas Sycions Latins Sycions, Alba, Alba, Capys, Capys, Tybenos, Areipas, Romulus, Arvantes, Procas, and Amulius. This Amulius usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of eldperth was due to his brother Numitor. And for fear lest there might arise from his brothers offfpring, some one to make claim and recover the royall seat, and thereby himselfe be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Reu, the daughter of Numitor to Vesti, for to be a profected Nun. She being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetual virginity, happened to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boys, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus, Amulius advertised hereof, commanded both the babes to be call forth to perish. Found they were by Fenius a shepherd upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Fensius fostered and brought up among other shepherds, Remus being grown to mans elate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to A. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he had killed the child and drive away whole droves of Numitor his carrell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punnished according to his distrection. But Remus after much difcour of speeches to and fro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numitor his daughters ion. And at the very time came Romulus also with Fenius in place, purposing to reculf Remus his brother. Soon they entered into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered A. Amulius: and restored their grandfathers Numitor. In the seconf year of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remus built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perish, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulus and Remus striving for the sovereignty, Remus came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome.
CHAP. III.

The form and bigness of the City of Romulus.

Romulus let out the City foursquare, as Plutarch witnesseth: whereupon of some it is called Quadrata. Others affirm, that the form and compass thereof is uncertain, and by reason of Antiquity unknown at this day: The hill Palatins was by Romulus first fortified, because therein he was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomerium. Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the Beast-market: from whence in certain places were stories pitched and set between, along the bottom of the mount Palatins, as far as to the altar of Consus; and so within a while to the old Curia: then, to the Chappell of the Laters and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, until a place was assigned for the walls, and a spacious plot to build the City upon.

Tutus Tarpeus began the wall from the rock Carmentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from Tyber. From thence Southward unto the further part of the grand Cirque: and to Northward he ranged it into the Forum of Nerat, and in the end joined it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compassed both the Capitol it self; and also the Palatins. And finally, to enlarge the City, he let to it the hills Quirinalis and Caelum.

CHAP. III.

The gates of Romulus his City.

Romulus when he died, left the City of Rome with three gates, namely, Carmentalis, Romula, and Pandara. Others add a fourth thereunto, to wit Janus.

Carmentalis took the name of Carmentis the mother of Evander, whose Chappel Carmentale stood before the gate. This gate stood under the Capitol on the right hand, between the cliff Tarpeia and the Tyber over against the Church now of S. Katherine, towards the southwest. Magonia, This was afterwards named Securitas, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senate passed, for the lending of the three hundred Tabith to Cremona, who went forth at this gate, and were slain every one at Cremora.

Romula was called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary, not far from the angle of the mount Palatins in the bottom of the cliff of Victoria. Some affirm, that this gate was afterwards called Magna, of the lowing of cane and oxen: others name it Trigonum, of three corners that it had.

Pandara was so named, because it stood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The same also was called Libera or Romula. The place for it was assigned where the gate Saturnia stood, bearing the name of the old City, so called and after destroyed.

Janus carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off. It stood sometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis.

CHAP. V.

The variety of the compasses and walls of the City.

When the Romans one while made war upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and others while defended themselves against their violence, it happened for the most part, that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them, under their subjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome; by which occasion the City built by Romulus, was not sufficient to receive so great a multitude. Tullus therefore after his conquest of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Caelum and the Esquiline, and enlarged it. Afterwards, when Polesium was won, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome, Ancus made a second enlargement of the City, and granted these new commotes the mount Avventine to inhabit. The old City therefore moved in Palatine; the Sabins in Carmentalia; the Albans in Caelum: and this new come multitude in Avventina. But after the Latines also were received into the City, they joyned Janiculum also to the city by a wooden bridge made over the Tyber: and cast a trench called Faustus Quirinalis about the low and level places of the city. So the Tran-tiberine quarter was united to the city, and made it more spacious and lately of all, Servius Tullus by adjoining the hills Viminals and Quirinalis to the five above mentioned, amplified the city. And as before it was bounded about with rubbish, and the same rudeely laid, Tarquin the proud was the first that enclosed it with a wall of good ashlar stone: And the very same walls which stand at this day, were by the pohtery that followed, repaired and reedified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when it flourished in greatest glory, extended far more in bounds and compass. For in Plinian time the circuit thereof within the wall contained about 50 miles. But in these days hardly 12. And the whole compass of the city, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they spread far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) is in the said Plinian time, was 50 miles.
The Topography of Rome.

CHAP. VI.

The Pomeroy of the City.

That void space of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomeroy. And sometime it is set for the circuit of the whole City. This Pomeroy was oftentimes let out farther, and altered by the Roman Emperors. But none had power granted so to do, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Roman domination, or endowed the City with some singular and especial benefit; as the Emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, so no set bounds confined either the City or the Pomeroy.

CHAP. VII.

The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be seen: those also that are now extant.

Even as the bounds of the City and Pomerone were many times altered, so the gates also; some were left within the City, by occasion that the walls were farther set out and left their names: others in time were so old, that they fell down; and albeit their name remain, yet the place where they stood is not known. Some again were made new, and took either new names, or else kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were some that had two names: and others, more. And these in manner were all the names of the gates:

Flumentana or Flaminia,
Nomentana or Viminalis,
Esquilina or Taurina,
Caelia, or Appia,
Tiberina or Hosfienfi,
Retamena, or Vientana,
Montania, Salaria, Mittia, Practinaria, Prescina, Libinaria, Valeria, and Tepaeia.

Flumentana took name of the river Tyberis; for it stood at the first upon the bank of that river, not far from the bridge of Xylen in the end of the Broad Street, and at the head of the way or street Flumentana; but afterwards, translated it was to the place where now it standeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the cause of Flaminius: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is situate in the hill Hortolorum.

Collatina: bare the name of Collatina, a town not far from Rome: now it is Pinciana, of one Pincius a Senator, whose name it keepeth. This also standeth in the hill Hortolorum: between it and Flumentana is a noble space.

Quirinalis took name of the Chappel of Quirinum: or became in old time the way lay through it: for they went to the hill Quirinum. It seemeth to be called Agonensis: quasi ab eodem, i.e. without a corner; afterwards Collina: and at the left Salaria: for that it was carried into the City, this name it heldeth still, and standeth 6 Stadia from Collatina.

Viminalis is from Quirinalis distant 5 Stadia; so named, as they lay of a wood of Oiers, which (as it is supposed) sometime grew there: or else, of a Chappel of Janus Viminalis. This also men called Ficinonis, of the potter works made without it: but now they name it the gate of S. Agrippa and Numantiana.

Interrogates standeth in the Plain Viminalis: between the gate Viminalis and Esquilina: it had the denomination of Taurinum: his mures and banks, among which it was built.

Taburnia stood between Esquilina and Nomentana: so as it was 2 Stadia distant from Esquilina: upon the plain of Esquilina: in the very place where the conduit is of the Mare water.

Esquilina took that name of the hill Esquilina: the same in ancient time was called Taurina: of a bulk head there found: for many a day after was the said bulls head seen painted in the inner front of the said gate. At this day, S. Lawrence gate.

Numa drew the name of certain groves or woods near adjoyning. In time past Labicana, and now Mayor: An arch there was so called: and erected in the same place by the old Romans.

Collatinesa standing from Numis 8 Stadia: seemeth by affinity of name to be so called of the hill Collina: in the edge whereof it standeth: and Appia: it was called, of the Ayes which were wont to be sent out to Naples: by that gate. At this time they call it S. John gate.

Gabinia: built close to the mount Colius: Southwell: which seemeth to be likelihood to take the name of the City Gabinia: which it directly regardeth. It carried the name also Meridum: of measuring and is situate from Collatinesa: as it were 5 Stadia.

Latinia: 5 Stadia like wise from Gabinia: stood not far from the Church of S. John Baptist: so called so that men go forth of it into Latinia.

Caelium: to named of the Cappenas: Lateine nation, aginst which it lyeth. This also is called Caelium: of a grove and Chappel of the Muses, built just before the same gate. Appia: likewise, of the high-way Appia: which Appius the Center paved: and to it bare his name. They call it also
The Topography of Rome.

also Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pomp is that way carried with state, of some it is named Fontinalis, for the plenty of springs there. At this day S. Sebastianus gate.

Tertullian took that name of an old gate so called, at which the twins Horatii went forth against their enemies, and gave the first name to it. Some shew remaineth yet of this gate to be seen, near the Suburra.

Hostilia, was in ancient days so called, for that it led to the City Hostia: now S. Paulus gate: situate it is from Capena well-neer 8 Stadia.

Portunus is a gate beyond the Tyber, within half a Stadium of the said river; so called, for that it leadeth to the haven of Hostia. Now a daies men call it, Porta ripa. The bank gate.

Anfona, looketh toward Janiculum; distant from the former almost 7 Stadia. In this age they call it S. Pancrace gate.

Altar, was built by Aulus Hadrians, of whom it took that name.

Septimius, bare the name of Septimius the Emperor: and because it standeth under Janiculum, is at this day called S. Sabius Janum. Some affirm, that this is Fontinalis, because out of the mount called Anfona, there issue fountains: for to the said hill this gate standeth close. From it to Anfona are 5 Stadia: and to the river Tyber 7 jugera or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the City of Rome, and their names. The wall in old time had upon it 360 curnets. Some of these are decayed and gone: others repaired, and many long time are ready to fall.

CHAP. I.

The sundry names of the Capitol.

The Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saturnus, either of a City named Saturn, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome standeth: or because Saturn in times past dwelt in that hill: or else (as some think,) for that the mount itself had Saturn for the titular God and Protector thereof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeia, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth. Lafi of all, Tarquinius Priscus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chance to find in the bottom of the trench a man's head: whereupon they called it Capitolium. And the Angurs being brought unto and demanded, What the finding of that head might signify? answered, That this Castle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the Castle and the Capitol. The Castle they built Northward, as a stronger and more fortified place: but the Capitol, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended.

CHAP. II.

Who first laid the foundation of the Capitol: who finished it: how often it was burnt, and by whom restored.

In the Sabine war, Tarquinius Priscus vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, so soon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tarquinius Superbus finished the buildings, of 4 square stone: and defaited the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pomatia, a Town that was his. When he for his tyranny was banished Rome, Lucius Puteullus, the Consul dedicated the said Capitol to Jupiter. It stood upright and found for the space of 430 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Constilship of Scipio and Nauro) it was consumed with fire. Sulla-re-erected it, and Q. Catinus consecrated it: and so it continued until the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a second time burnt, at what time it stood with all the doores shut, undefended, and not rifed. Vespasian built it again and in his life a third time it was destroyed by fire: and together with the Capitol, Vespasian also himself died. Afterwards, Domitian rebuilt it in more magnificent and stately manner than it had been ever before, and disturbed therein above 10000 talents. Of the Capitol turrets and pinacles, the statues and images smitten with thunder-bolts and blasted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

CHAP. III.

The Capitol, Cicero calleth The house and habitation of the gods, because it contained the chappel, statues, and images in manner of all the gods: but the first of all others in Rome was... that of Jupiter Forcirus, vowed by Romulus in the war against the Cenjenians. After which war ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitol hill, But Jupiter was by Romulus named Forcirus, as some would have it; for that Jupiter alighted him in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or else, because the Romans used in making of peace, to swear by his scepter and the flint. The roof of this Church fell down for very age and through neglect of the Romans, Augustus repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterward enlarged by Ancus Martius.

But the temple of Inv. Opt. Maxv, of all other was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capitolium; and Targ. Persiens vowed it. After him, Targ. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of silver: but before that he finished it, he was deprived of his kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unperfect to be accomplished by the Romans. Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tyberis, as hath been shewed before. For the form, the greatness and beauty of this temple, read Dimenius and sundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it self. Upon the top or lantern thereof, stood Salmnus the God, made of potters earth, whole head was smitten with lightning and fell into Tyberis. It had within it besides, a lanctuary or secret chapel, which no Lay person might enter into. Within the said cell or chapel, were two corones of gold: the one of them, the Gauls consecrated to Inv. Opt. Maximus: the other, the Cathaginians sent to Rome in the honor of Jupiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnites. Moreover, in the said temple were other three chapels; to wit, one of Inv. Opt. Maxv, in the middle second of Minerva on the right hand: and a third of Inv. on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was set down in writing, That the chief and highest Pretor for the time being, should drive a spike or great nail near unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This so rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian war. Now at this day the place where it stood, is prophane: howbeit there remain yet to be seen, some tokens thereof, and the foundations; but all deformed and broken pietement.

CHAP. IV.

Since that we have described the temple of Jupiter K, of the Gods, in what place it was, and by whom built; meet it is to make report also of other gods in order, who had their houes in the capitol: and first of Saturn, Jupiter's father.

Saturn in old time had an altar erected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as some think. There be that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by the companions of Hercules: others again say, that Tatius reared it. But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated to Saturn, but reared in divers places and at several times: one at the rock of Carmenta, even before the capitoline cliff (wherein the bones also of the gods brought from Aricia were bestowed:) the other in that very place, where now standeth the chapel of S. Saviour; where yet at this day there is a turret to be seen which they call, the Tower in Ararum: for there first was the common treasury houfe of Rome. In the temple of Saturn, dedicated by Caius Lucius Tatius, there stood Inv. with four faces; signifying the four times of the year: of whom the fifth month January took name.

The temple of Inv. Opt. Augustus Caesar first built, on the capitoline cliff or side of the hill, South-east: upon this occasion: It hapned, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as he was carried by night in a litter, the lightning frightfully glanced thereupon, and killed the servant that was the guide; and therefore he both vowed this temple, and also finished it to the honor of Thundering Jupiter. A temple also to Fortune was built not far from it.

The temple of Veiovis, stood between the castle and the capitol, in that part where now the chapels are to be seen of conservators. In o'd time they called this Idol-devil, Veiovis, because he was deprived of all power to help and do good. To him they sacrificed a fife goat: because he held arrows in his hand, most men thought he was Apollo.

Apsimu, that is to say, the temple of Mercury stood likewise upon the capitol hill, near a shadowy grove, in the very valley amid the capitol, and the castle. Called it is the temple Intercumbens, between two oke rows. This, Romulus erected; that what offender forever thither fled, he should be privileged as in a sanctuary, but Tyberius afterwards, supposing that this place ministered occasion of mischief, deprived of that liberty. This Apsimu, by report, the posterity of Hercules first erected. The temple (as also the mint-houfe) of Inv. Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where sometime stood the house of M. Manlius. This chapel, some report that Inv. vowed it: others, that L. Ciceroam the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Inv. called Moneta, of giving warning; for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was set, there was a voice heard of Inv., admonishing them of the future overthrow by the Senones. In this place now standeth a Senators houfe of Rome.
The temple of Janus, ere of the Capitoline castle, stood in that place, where at this day is the goal and prison for malefactors and felons, toward the South-west over- gainst the Forum Romanum. This Janus upon the Capitol, Remus and Taurins devised to have two faces presenting therby the two nations. Others would have him to be portrayed a face for his cunning and providence: for he was the first that invented the rostrum crown; also boats; the skill of navigation; baken care and many other things, which Janus took that name ab undus, of going, for that he travaeth about the heaven and all things else. For which cause he also named Verminus. In old time they beleued there was but one Janus; but posterity in later ages, have imagined more.

The temple of Jupiter Cofcius, Dominan (after he was invollved in the empire) built and placed his own image in the lap and bosome of that god, which flood where at this day the Silemyer talpits are, near to the temple of Janus.

CHAP. V.
The temple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capitol.

Among those gods, whose determinat place assigned to them in the Capitol, is not known where it was, the first was Terminus; as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude and formless stone. Unto him Taurins first vowed temples; and some say, that Numa deidicated it. How ever it be, no doubt very ancient it was, as easily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cause; when Tarquinus Superbus determined to build a temple to Jup. the other consulted with the Augurs about the place, because he would begin nothing without the tughest Station of the birds. They flewed unto him the monus Tapinuis, but this place was already taken up with other gods, whose chappels there, were consecrated and hallowed. Then there were by certain Ierifices to be conjuered out from thence, for to give way to Jup. and to be tranferred into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yielded their places up to Jup. as their King, only Terminus, saied to be displaced; and remanied there still.

When he had finishid the temple and four-part of the roof which regardeth the laid stone, he was left naked and open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be enoiled, the augurs therefore being brought out and demanded, for what reason Terminus alone stood still with Jup., when all the other gods were gone? made answer, that thereby signified, this together with religion, their empire also was eternal. To this god they sacrificeth not but in open air and publicly abroad, as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Augustines witnesseth, that Mars and Jup. together with Terminus would not agree to give place to Jup. for that the dominion of Rome should not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venus Ercina, Attius and Q. Fab. Max. being Dnnwirs, dedicated chappels upon the Capitoll, severed aunder by one vault or citern.

To queen Jum. C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple.

To Opt. Taurius the K. consecrated a temple; for that she is the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The same Opt is called Maia, Fauna, and Bona Dea. This temple was blased with fire from heaven, as Livy telleth us.

Mars revenges, Augustus Caesar erected a temple upon the Capitoll, within the hill Saturniun.

To Faith, on the same hill, Attius Collatius dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Victory, they builded temples; and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Primigenia and Obsequenza, Tubulus dedicated a temple.

To Venus Xauda they also set up a temple in the Capitol, in memorialis and ever fling profane of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engines, that during the Galls war, were deviseid and made against the enemies.

Taurinus Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponsor, and Sp. Posthominus dedicated it. Like-wise to Jupiter, Piter, the old Romans consecrated a temple in the Capitol.

CHAP. VI.
Of the statues which either in old time were or now remain in the Capitol.

Of statues in old time were many fatory, and the same made of divers matter: some of marble, some of brasse, some of silver, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the capitol to the immortal gods for divers causers, and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which a long time were honoured and worshipped. To noble men likewise and such as had decreed well of the commonwealth, the usuall manner was in old time to set up statues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiter in the Capitol, Sp. Carvillus erected a statue in his temple, after he had vanquished the Samnians, taking the proportion or form thereof by the pattern of Jupiter Latiurne his image. From this mention, that this statue was written with lightning. He also set up another to honouring Jupiter.

The old Romans set up in the temple of Jup. Opt. Max. statues to Victory and Faith, to either of them one.
The Topography of Rome.

For Nemesis also was an image erected in the Capitol, for that this goddess punished proud and faithless persons. She is named also Ramnusa of Ramnus, a village in Attica, where she was worshipped: & Adraste, of Adraste, who was the first that built a temple in the honor of her.

Unto Hercules, for his notable and famous acts, they erected many statues in the Capitol: and namely, Pub. Sulpicius and Pub. Sempronius one; & Q. Fabius Max, another, which he brought from the Tarentins by him subdued.

The images of good Event, and good fortune (the workmanship both of Praxiteles) were within the Capitol.

The image of Apollo with a diadem, and his Cælius thirty cubits high, in the making whereof were bestowed 140 talents, Lucullus translated out of Apollonia in Parthia, into the Capitol.

There was an image of Janus likewise in the Capitol, holding in his right hand the number of 300 and in his left of fifty five, to signify the dates of the year.

Two golden statues of Cæsarius and Politian, were by the Emperor Claudius dedicated in the temple of Jupiter.

The counterfeits resembling the rivers, Nilus and Tigris, half naked, were set up in the front of the temple of Conservatores: the one easy upon the shoulders, Sphyx; the other a Tygris; two wild beasts: both of them hold in their right hand Cornucopias, which fignifie plenty.

The personage of Hercules pourtrayed naked, of baffe and double goit, without beard, holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden Apples of Hesperides, was found near the Greek school and the beast market, in the ruins of Ara Maxima.

There be certain portraits also of the Parthian and Dacian victors, made by him, which were taken out of the church now called S. Martina, and high.

CHAP. VII.

Statues of famous and noble men set up in the Capitol.

To Scipio they erected in the Capitol a statue wearing a tunic; and another in the midst of the Kapitol, Portraits in regard of his victory over Antiochus, for an everlasting monument of his worthy deeds.

To Sulla was also a statue erected in the Capitol: having an image of a Citizen.

The one to Metellus, for he had preserved out of the temple of Vesta being on fire, the image of Pallas.

They erected an image to Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchus, in remembrance of a benefit of hers.

For that in a great dearth of corn, she served the people with fritattas and Modius. The same they did to Trebonius the Edile.

Fabius Maximus made for himself a cast or molten image, and reared it just by that of Hercules.

Unto Bruttius, for delivering Rome from the tyranny of Tarchonius, the Romans erected his image in the midst of the Kapitol, Portraits.

Domitian would not suffer any image of his to be erected, unless it were of molten silver or gold, and of a certain weight.

The Emperor Commodus took off the head from the colossus of Nero, & set upon it his own statue which he had in the Capitol. This Colossus is to be seen broken as it was, in the houses of Conservatores.

In the said houses of Conservatores, is extant yet the brazen portraiture of a she-wolf, at whose feet, Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, are to be seen how they hung acaffer.

The image of Romulus and Remus remained in the Capitol, resembling two youths: the one standing upon the feet in fervile habit and attire: the other sitting like a shepherd or heardman, bending forwards with the body, plucking a thorn out of the sore of his foot, which rakelled and festered withall.

An infinite number of statues were in the Capitol, of gods especially, brought from other parts to Rome. For the Romans robbed the churches of foreign nations, for to enrich and adorn their own.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Capitoll cliff, Tarpeia rock, the stone of Carmenta, and the gate Stercoraria.

In old time, they called that place and way whereby men go up to the Capitol, Clivus; Capitollius: but where that place was in times past, learning opinions there be. Some affirm, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh to the Aventine, where now standeth St. Gregories Church in Velarium; others between the temples of Saturnus and Concordia, over to the arch of Severus, and at the Stalus and landings, called Senatoris Statula. Now the arch of Severus was raised at the foot of the Capitol hill, in the very head and top of Forum Romanum: under which they passed, that in triumph ascended up into the Capitol. The Capitol cliff then, was near unto the Roman Forum: which by the Romans was paved with flint: who also set up a gallery from the Chappell of Saturn unto the Capitol Temple close to the

The Topographie of Rome.

Senaculum and the Curia over it, Corn. Tacitus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and ways upon the Capitol, and thereupon arose so many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus. In the place of the feast Flora was in old time celebrated, whereof some tokens remain in this day to be seen. In it stood Miles' house, which was full of shields and other armor, Cicero maketh report.

That place was called Tarpey rock which standeth over the Forum Romanum: from whence in times past fellonious malefactors found guilty, were pitched down head-long, and wherein at this day offenders are punished.

Comment: Rome, regardeth Tyberis, just over-against the Senators' bridge.

The Dung-gate called Stercoraria stood upon the Capitol cliff aforesaid; thither was thrown out all the fifth rid out of the temple of Vesta, for to be carried away and soon after to be cast into the Tyberis.

CHAP. IX.

Of tables, of the brazen columns or pillars, and of the silver Goose.

CHAP. X.

Now that we have made declaration of the statues, tables, and columns, worth the noting something by the way would be said in the place, as touching the ancient housethere.

The court called Calabra Curia, Romulus built the Capitol, and covered it with tiles. Into this place the King-sacrificer was wont to assemble the Senators and people of Rome, that from him they might learn and know the dates of solemn games, plays, and sacrifices.

Not far from the said Curia was the cottage of Romulus.

And almost the same place stood the stately porch or gallery of Mesenius and Cononius. The Library also called Majorum, built stifically upon marbles pillars, and besides the publick court-yard.

There was an hallowed place likewise upon the Capitol from whence they gathered Pergamum or sacred herbs, to make garlands for the facials heralds and the Paterborasses: whereof they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The first stone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they swere by Jupiter, pronouncing their words, if I made defaults with my knowledge, then let Diepiter cast me out of all that I have (saying the City and the castle) as I hurl from me this stone.

The Capitol had certain vats like cisterns, into which were thrown all things over-worn, or so old that they were good for nothing. The fixt steeds drawing in one team, were there to be seen, which Casus Cornelius set up, the twelve gilded shields likewise, made of that many where in the Edils condemned and fined the corn-mongers that hoarded and kept their corn. The shield also of Marsius, set out with the image of Isrumbas and the columns garnished with fine beast-heads of braze, whereof Livy speaketh, were here to be seen. Within the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus there was a short cloak or mantle and purpule worn, to which, of other purple garments were laid, they shewed the colour of silkes in regard of the excellent bright globes and lustre that it carried. A present this was (by report) given to Aurelius by Perseus K, who had it from the Espefe Britons. The lintell, cheeks and fall of the Capitol door, were made all of brass. The brazen tiles likewise upon the roof, Quaestor gilded over the place where Numus took his auguries.

there was a temple called the temple of jupiter, having been there was an altar consecrated to Pan. But as touching the etymology and derivation of the name, as also of the situation thereof, there go diverse opinions: for as in times past the place was close hidden and unrequencnt, so now it is inhabited on every side; insomuch as there remaineth no mark and token at all where Lupercal was. Howbeit the greater part of writers affirm, that Romulus and Remus were laid to petil, and so carried by water to the place called after wards Romulanae, were under a fig-tree there, nourished by a she wolf. This wolf suck’d & kept in the den called Lupercal & from thence ran to the bank side under the fig-tree Romulanae, to the suckle the said babies, and to gave the name unto the cave to be called Lupercal, as it were, the lurking hole and den of the wolf. There be again that would have Evander to give the name to the same hollow cave: for he, as is before declared, was descendent from Arcadia, where the people after most ancient rites and ceremonies, do right devoutly worship Pan, the god of herdsman. Into whom also a mountain in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lyceum, for that he keepeth, saveth, wolves from the sheep, and preserveth the flockes and herds. This Evander therefore coming upon a time into Italy, and resting in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his country, there honoured him. In this said cave therefore rested was an altar, and a goat thereupon sacrificed unto him, as to the god and preserver of the flockes: and feeng that he was chas’d wolves from them, therefore the place wherein he was worshiptook the name Lupercal.

Now the feast Lupercalia was by Romulus and Remus instituted. For they having obtained of Numitor a plot of ground to build them a city on, in that very place where they had been, it forth, called all their companions to a feast and merry meeting: where, after they had killed sacrificers, and refreshed themselves with meate, and withall take their wine liberally to the full, they grew to diport, and in the merry fit clad themselves in the skins of the goats which they had slaine, and then fell to hopping and dancing full jocundly. Hereupon their potterie, celebrating the memorial thereof, held a festival solemnity called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where hitho they began. Hereof see more in Valerius Maximus, Servius & Plutarch in the life of Aetous. As for the fig-tree Romulanae, it was so called of the river Tyber, called at the Romam, Some would have it take the name of Romulus. Others of the milk given to the said infants, for part of the throat which dreweth milk it called Romna in Latins. This place was over against the house of the two lords Caesar & Domitian, on the side of the Mount Palatine, opposite against the new-place, called Circus Maximus. Romulus and Remus thus laid forth about Lupercal, and carried by the water to this place, were fostered for a while under the fig-tree Romulanae, in the place where the Comitian after was. The tokens of this tree remaineth unto this time of Augustus, as Ovid testifieth.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the new way, the streets Jugurth and Tuscan.

The street called the new way over against the temple of Jupiter Sutor, goeth along the valley between the Capitol hill and the Palatine, and reacheth to the Forum Romanum. This however it be called new, was well known to be most ancient, and is different from that, which Caecilia repaired under his bains.

The street Jugurth, otherwise called Thuraria, is leadeth from the gate Carmentalia, along the foot of the Capitol hill, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Janus Iugis, who was thought to make marriages, and to couple folk in matrimonies, and fir the it was that gave the name to Vico Jugurth.

Vico Tusculum begins at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine the way to Velabrum, the reason of the name was this. The Tusculans upon a time fighting against the Artekens, were by them overcome, and after many thousands of them slain in battle, the red being few in number fled to Rome: who taking delight in the pleasant seat of the City, & the commodiousness of the place, determined there to remain, Whereupon having a plot of land, & granted them by the Senat, between the Capitol and Palatine, they inhabited the same. Hereupon the street was called by them Tusculum, & many a 100 year after retained that name. In it afterwards there kept bawds and such kind of people, whereupon it grew out of credit, and left also the first name.

CHAP. XV.
The Arch of Romulus, the Senaculum, and the dwelling house of Ovid.

The old arches (which some think Romulus erected) continued a long time built of brick, neither would the Romans suffer that any man should make them of marble, to the end, that the memorial of their City founder, should remain more firmly in the minds of men. But in continuance of time long after, they decayed and fell down, in that very place where now is the church of Saint Mary of Grace, and were never afterwards redified. The Romans named that place Senaculum, between the Capitol and the Forum, wherein the Senat kept a consistory for counsell and conflation.

Of the Chappell and altar of the goddess Viriplaca of Faith, and Jupiter Victor.

Not to those gods only that did good to mankind the Romans consecrated temples, but dedicated chappels to those all that did them harm, to the end that they should do less harm, and punish them more gently. For certain it is, that on the hill Palatine there was a temple & altar both consecrated to the Euergetes, likewise to Nemesis the goddess of vengeance, whose image before in the second book

Besides they erected a chapel of the Lares in the Palatine.

In like manner, there was a chappell in the Palatine, consecrated to the goddess Viriplaca; into which, if man and wife came together, although they disagreed and were taken out before, they returned home again good friends from thence, and all was well.

After that, Emes with his son, Acron, and daughter, Romulus came into Italy, they reared a temple to Faust, in Palatine; they which was dedicated notwithstanding the name of the daughter, and the name was written in the forefront of the temple; and therefore many years after, when Romulus and Remusrove who should give name to the City, the Senate and people of Rome reading the name of Emes, his daughter in the frontispice of the said temple, resolved to name the City after her, Roma.

Q. Fabius in the Sabin hill, vowed a temple to Jupiter conqueror; and afterwards built it on the Palatine hill, and there dedicated it.

CHAP. III.

The temple of Heliogabalus, Apollo and the Penates: the house of Orcus; the place of the Palladium, or image of Minerva; and the temple of Augustus.

Neronius Heliogabalus consecrated a god to the mount Palatine, which he called Heliogabalus, and built a temple in the place, where before flood that of Orcus or Pluto. But to win credit and name to this new and counterfeit god with great reverence and worship, he endeavoured to translate into this temple of his, the sacred cup of that great mother of the gods, the fire of Vesta, the image of Minerva, called Palatina, the head 1/4 cireogens, and all things else which the Roman, honoured above the rest. The Cæsarian and Jewish religion also were counterfeited, to this end, that no man in the worship of that temple and god, might alledge any pretence why he should not with good confidence to do Moreover, in the Palatine there was built a most ancient temple of Apollo. This chance to be overthrown by thunder and lightning; and when the foothsayers gave out, the great god misled it, and required another, Augustus Caesar rejoined a porch to the ruin thereof; and renamed the temple to new that there stood where in himself, when he grew aged, many a time sat in council with the Senate, and empanelled the decrees of judges. In like wise were pendent canopettes, branched with arms like trees, wherein the approved poets enrolled their writings. Certain marks and tokens of this temple are to be seen (although obscurely) near to the vineyard of Cestius, where the house of Tibullus stood. Unto him were instituted the Apolline games where read Ceres.

The temple of the City-protectors, called Penates, stood in that part of the Palatine which looketh into the North, even to Vesta not far from the Forum. In it were the images of the Trojan gods, in the same were portrayed two young men sitting together, and holding a bowl in their hand, in like manner, the crooked sugar-houses called Lantus, a river and lake. Besides, an earthen Trojan vessel of potter's work, Apollo, and Neptunus were there to be seen.

When the temple of Vesta was on a right burning fire, the image of Pallat being saved out thereof, was translated into Vesta, and gave the name unto temple of Palatæa, now St. Andrews church, standing in the same place.

Some report, that there was a temple built in Palatæa to Augustus Caesar of famous memory by his daughter Livia.

CHAP. V.

The Palatine houses, and the court of the Salii.

Hat Romulus and Remus being shepherds abode some time in these parts, the shepherds and cottages, which long time after were found here, made of flight wood & reed, do testify which of them in continuance of time decayed and fell down, the shepherds repaired with the like matter to their ancient form, that this perpetual memorial of Romulus and Remus, the City founders, what kind of persons they were, and what manner of houses they lived in, might be delivered to posterity. In the corner of the Palatine hill, which leadeth into the grand cirque or show-place, there stood (many ages) the cottage which they called Casa Romuli.

Tullus Hostilius, before he built his court dwelt upon Vesta, in that very place were afterwards the chappell of the Penates found.

Not far from thence, even in that part of the Palatine which regarded the Forum, Catullus (by report) had his house built, More Moreover, between M. Scaurus his house and Caelium, there was but a small step over.

Cicero's house put, baiided of Cassius, was in the most frequent and conspicuous place of the mount Palatine, above the Church of Jup. Stator, near the Palatium.

Puting to teith, how the houses of Cassius the Orator, and Vitellius, in the Palatium, were in old time overturned.

One Captain Valatin, likewise had an house in the Palatium.

Also Tiberius, whereof we have written in the former chapter.

Augustus (born in the region about Palatium, in a place called Capitabula, the one heads; and where after his death, they erected a chappel unto him) dwelt first near the Roman Forum, above the round stairs called Scala monumental, in the house sometime of Calvus the Orator. Afterward he built the lately Palatine at his own charges and gave it to the City, and himself dwelt on the Patine hill in the small house of Horatius.

The Guild, or religious court of the Salius, built in the mount Palatine, chance to be burnt; and in the allies thereof, the staff of Romulus called Latina was found, without any hurt.

Palatins dwelt in an house standing over the Forum, which was called Suburra.

That the dwelling house of Turquinus Fiesus was near unto the Temple of Jup. Stator, may soon be proved out of Lives.

CHAP. VI.

Of the top of Vilia; the stones in Palatine, and other things in general.

The pitch of the hill called Sumam Vilia, was in that higher part of Palatium, which looketh into the South-east, whereas now is the Temple of Mary the new. Called Vilia it was, because in old time before the device of shearing sheep the shepherds were there wont to pluck the wool from the sheepe backs.

Augustus set up a library of Latin and Greek books in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brases of that huge colousus of Tufcan Apollo. He adorned thereunto a porch or gallery, which they called Palatinm.

In it was erected by the Senate, a statue unto Nereus; the Emperor, and a singular oratory.

In the same porch, the Romans also set up a statue unto M. Tullius, whiles he lived.

The Augusterum, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatine. Apollo Palatinus likewise, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium. Latona in the same was placed.

Thus the Emperor set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannicus.

Moreover, the tree which grew out of Romulus his spear was in the Palatium. For he, after he had taken his auguries in the mount Arvernian, landed his spear from him into the Palatine, which sticking in the earth, budded forth leaves and grew to be a tree.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was born, sprung with him and suddenly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurel tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed Garland.

The Palatine plains, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for Roscius, were in the same Palatine, and of them there remain yet some tokens, above the Cirrus max. not far from the vineyard of Federus.

In the same mountain also there was a place called Similia, and Jupiter parlor.

The most beautiful streets called Atrium, paved with Lacedemonian and Porphyry stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Puteus, and Fortune's altars, were to be seen in Palatine. And there were the games and parades celebrated, which they call Palatinal.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Green: the court-yard of the Palatium: and the old gate of the very Palatium it self.

How great a compass the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how rich, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins the pictures, statues, and most precious pillars there found, do easily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built it to great and lately edifices, who after wards enlarged the same, and in it put many a place erected those houses. By little & little it grew to so great an height, as all writers should be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done or at once, which seemed worth the memorial. For Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium major, and setting aside the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replemished with vines or foter pasture, ycleth Graves and food for sheepe, capes, and goats. So as it feemeth it may be called Palatium of the sheepe that sheep make, rather than Palatium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Arrium, built in old time and allowed by August in it the Senate gate in council, because they might not assemble in any place unagurte or unhallow. Therein also rams were sacrificed.

The old gate of the Palatium was near the Forum, over-gainst S. Laurence Church in Miranda, some would have this to be the gate of Romulus, in old time.

CHAP. VIII.
The Temples of Janus, Augustus, and Faustina.

After the description of the Temples and edifices of Palatium, the third part of the city, now followeth a fourth: namely, the Roman Forum. Therein is the most sacred Temple of Janus, (for me thinks we do well to begin at Janus, who is counted the door and entrance as it were of all things, For Janus himself, who was therein worshipped, had four faces and from Palatia's city in Tuscany forced by the Romans, he was translated to Rome into the Forum, named after Transtrium. His Temple was built in that part of the said Forum which looked toward the Roman Forum. Procula latus, that in his days it was built in the midst of the Forum over against the Capitol, a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Delfines. Other Temples there were besides of Janus, and namely, in the Capitol near the theatre of M. Cecilis, with two fronts all of brass, and had two brazen doors; which in time of peace were shut; and against war, were let open.

The temple of Augustus was built in the Roman Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, but let unperfect. Caligula finished it. Above it, he made a bridge which joined the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be seen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Faustina. Hadrianus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill, where the brazen image of a bull (standeth) for her sake that she might be honoured as a goddess. The same his son Antoninus Pius, afterwards would have to be a temple for himself, or Jupiter Spenes, or else the Sun. At this day it is the church of St. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX.
The Temple of Cæsar and Pollux, and the Rostra.

No man doubteth but that the temple of Cæsar and Pollux was sometime in the Roman Forum before the Rostra, near to that above-said of Faustina. This fared house A. Posthumus the Dictator dedicated: and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian spoil. In it, as in many other, the Senate used to sit in council, and therein were public Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein also he set up the portraiture and semblance of Flora, a picture of singular beauty. A table besides, which contains the records and monuments touching the free burghership granted to the burghers of Capua. The flees and greeks going up to this temple, Cledon afterwards plucked up, as witneth Cicero.

There was a temple or conclave place called Rostra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, over-against that before-named of Cæsar and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappel of S. Mary de Inferno. From these Rostra, were the sentences and acts of the Senate, brought and propounded to the people.

CHAP. X.
The Temple of Cæsar, Venus Genitrix, and Mars avenger: and the court of Venus.

Cæsar of famous memory had a temple neer his own Forum, at the broad-street called Sacra, behind the temple of Faustina. In it were set up as Saints, Victory and Cæsar.

In the same Cæsar Forum, there stood a chappel of Venus Genitrix, behind the said temple of Faustina. This, Cæsar vowed in the Pharsalia war, and dedicated it. After Victory in the war against Pompey, Cæsar enclosed the temple of the said Venus, within a court-yard and a cloister, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Augustus Cæsar in the barrel of Philosophy, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards he edified in his own Forum, wherein were certain iron posts dedicated to Mars: and two statues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of Saint Martin.

CHAP. XI.
The Temples of Vulcan, Concord, Peace, Romulus, and Venus Cloacia.

The temple of Vulcan, Romulus founded, above the Comitium and Forum Romanum, at the bottom of the Palatine hill: but Titus dedicated the temple of V. Leo, as also of the Sun and Moon, of Saturn, Rhea, Vesta, Diana, and Quirinus. In the temple of V. Leo there was dedicated unto Vulcan the brazen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a second time. Therein remained also the statue of Coecles there erected. Many a time were Orations made to the people in this time.

In the yard belonging to Vulcan temple, Felixius, the font of a Libertine or enfranchised citizen, 303 years after the building of the Capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and Gentlemen to the people. Afterwards he built it of the amercements and penalties that he took of Writers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine, Opulent the Consul.
Conful afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny testifieth that an altar ran blood for two dates.

Livia Drusilla in her open gallery, erected a chappel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and loving agreement between her husband and her; which afterwards Tiburius dedicated.

In that place where Drusilla first founded the said chappel of Concord, Vespasian afterwards with wonderful celerity and speed, (after the civil wars ended) finished the Temple of Peace, begun before by Claudius. A large building this was and four square, let out with most stately and fair columns, and of all other Temples the richest. In it Vespasian bestowed the holy vessels and precious ornaments of the Temple in Hierusalem, which T. had shewed in triumph. It had also the statue of Campaspe, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once iudiciously was consumed whole; and never was it known to this day how this fire came; unless it were (as some imagine) by reaion of an earthquake which hapned the same hour, the stones rubbed together and fruck fire.

An altar of Peace was by Augustus first reared; but in what place, the posterity knoweth not. The name, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned, Between the Temple of Peace and Pantheon, there is at this day a most ancient Temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cæciliae and Dianæ, Some think it was the Temple of Romula and Remus, the name that Carolus the Conful, after he had subdued the Samnites, dedicated, and of the infinite many of spoils adored it.

That the Temple of Venus Cloriciae stood near the broad street Sacra, Ovid testifieth; Now the image of this Cloricia was found in a priory or draught, called Maxima, and Tatius consecrated it. And because it was not known what whole resemblance it was, it took the name of the place wherein it was found.

CHAP. XII.

The Temple of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the house of Cælius, and the Armony.

Where the Temple of Tellus stood, some say it is uncertain; others think it was not far from the Esquilus, near the rising of the hill that leadeth to S. Peter's Church in Vinculis, where as now standeth the Temple of Pontecluem, Sempronius vowed it: for whiles he fought a battaille with his enemy at Asculum, the head Town of the Picenians, the earth quaked: and because he would pacify the goddesss Tellus (i.e., the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Temple unto her. But it was in the same plot of void ground, where the house of Sprinias Cælius (who fought to be king) was overthrown. Near unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Armony: whereof Cælius also made mention in a certain place. Within the said compasse, C. Junius Bubacchus the Conful, vowed a chappel to the goddess Salus, in the time of the Samnites war. The same was by him put forth to building, when he was Censor, and dedicated by him Dictator.

L. V. Junius in Edilis, cauased the Temple of Victoria near the Roman forum to be made, of the penaltys and fines taken.

In this place also was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Asculapius, were near the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Mercury was also in the Forum.

The Temples likewise of Isis and Serapis were in the Burse called Emporium. And some think, that these were the Chappels of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tatius.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: thoes things now thrown, or that have been herebefore.

Thus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which seemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will speak of those things, which shall concern the honour and memorial of mortal men, and first begin we will with that excellent Prince Trajanus.

Forum Trajanus was built (with wonderful Art and industry of man) by Apollodorus, between the Forum of Nerva, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workman built also (at the commandent of Trajanus) Meteora and Gymnasion. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of braies, within round about in every place the forms and images of horses; and military enigns all guise. Now were these forefaid images erected there at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deferred well of the common-wealth, or otherwise of some notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon most mighty and high pillars, and resting upon large chapiters, yielded so great admiration to the beholders, that they deemed rather the works of giants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues of singular men.

Trajan horse in like manner stood in the mids, bearing upon high columns.

In a coin also there is found the image of Trajan, with this inscription: S. P. Q. R. Optimo

Prin-
The Topography of Rome.

Principis. The Senate and the people of Rome to the best Prince, But hereof Lampadius writeth much.

He likewise is reported to have adorned the palace, made of sundry marbles, with pictures and statues within.

In the midst of the Forum, there stood the column of Trajan, built with winding stairs. This had round about it the summary of the acts of Trajan engraved and chiselled most cunningly, but above all the Dakes war: within there be 185 steps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windows to let in light into them that shall go up: 120 foot high it was; or (as Eutropius writeth) 140. In the lower or lantern thereof were the bones of Trajan kept within a golden ball. This pillar, Trajan himself never saw; for whiles he ware against the Parthians, the Senate dedicated it into him in his absence. But he in his return from the Persian, died in the way at Seleucia, City in Syria of a flux of blood. His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors, he alone (as Eutropius writeth) was interred within the City. The reason why his bones are left in that Column is this: The manner in old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills; but there being not mountains enough whereupon to raise sepulchres in every place, it hapned that such steeples and high pillars were set over their dead bodies instead thereof.

CHAP. XIV.

The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

Next to our light cometh the Forum of Nerva, and is behind the Church of S. Hadrian, in the midst of it there stood a Column of brass of an huge signet; covered with plate of brass or copper, and hath within it light every way. This Forum was garnished with divers statues and Columns, containing the whole order of the acts of Nerva, This was afterwards called Forum Tranquillum, for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus and the Roman.

There appeareth as yet some part of the Porch or gallery belonging to the Forum: for being consumed by fire, yet it left certain obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Forum of Nerva.

Part also of the Palace of Nerva, built of four square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blaes; are yet seen enclosed between the Comitium and the tower of Aemus.

CHAP. XV.

The Roman Forum, the Comitium, the prison Tullianum, and the Image of Mætiorius.

The Roman Forum, which also is called Latium, began at the foot of the Capitol, and reached in length to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in Eupha. But at the first the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof abovenamed, it went no farther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Augustus Caesar enlarged it.

The Comitium joined to the Forum, or rather it was a part thereof: for it beginneth at the gate of Palatium and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foot of the Capitol hill, South-eastward, Ancus Martius built a prison for malefactors to be laid up in. After him K. Tullius adjoined it to that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge and mighty big stones, with narrow long holes for to receive the shadow, as it were, and resemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with stone, usy for darkness, and loathsome by reason of a strong and thinking scent. This whole prison was divided into two parts, the upper room and the nether. Caesar it was called in Latin Aequicorda, because it kept them there enclosed from coming forth.

Just before this prison there lieth a huge marble idol, which they call Mætiorius. Some think it was the Image of the bakers god, others of Jupiter, called Panarius, of the tumours that bear out like to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times past, when they were beleaguered by the Gauls in the Capitol, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp. Whereby the Gauls, desparing that the Romans could possibly be tamed with hunger, brake up the siege. Whereupon the Romans in perpetuall memorial of this benefit erected an altar and a statue to Jupiter Pistor.

This image is thought to be the remembrance of the river Rhenum in Germany, because it is upon a rock. But why it should be called Mætiorus, I know not, unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus.

CHAP. XVI.

The Secretary of the people of Rome; the arch of Septimius; the Temple of Saturn; Of the Treasury, and the mint-house where they coined many.

Behind the image of Mætiorius, over against the arch of Septimius is the Church of S. Martina: where, as it appeareth by an evidence engraved in marble, was sometime the place called the Secretary of the people of Rome.

Right against the said Church of S. Martina at the bottom of the rock Tegulae standeth the
The Topography of Rome.

ARCH of SEPTIMIUS, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that Emperor both by land and sea.

Directly there followeth the Temple, sometimes of SATURN, now S. HEDERIUS Church. The said Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Longinus for the builder thereof; others L. TARTINIUS; albeit more likely it is that Longinus dedicated it. Longus wrote, that when Aspendinianus and M. Minucius were Cæfars, Numanus Plutarch testifieth it. The treasury of the people of Rome, no longer denied, but that it was translated out of the Capitoline this Temple. But why men in old times would have the treasure to be within SATURNI Temple there be divers opinions. Some say, because in Saturni daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetousness nor levvd person laid wait for his neighbour, but all things were administered with righteouness, faith, and love. Cyprian alledge this case, because Saturn was the first that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the public ordinances. Also the books called PLANTINI, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome. Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts: also the ancient writings and decrees of the old LATERINUM and the City debts. Furthermore, the standards and ensigns of war, ORDERED & besides, whatsoever was by the Generals and Captains after the conquest of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Lastly, whatsoever was expedient and profitable for the Common-wealth to be reserved, as laws, letters, and other common registers of a City. The Centurions likewise were put to take their oath in the Temple of SATURN.

Between the Church now of S. HEDERIUS, and that which sometime was the Temple of COFET and POLIX, stood in old time the work-house wherein they coined money.

CHAP. VII.
The golden Millarium, the bridge of Caligula, the ROFTRA and the CURIA.

MILLARIUM; a column, in times past at the head of the Roman FORUM, under the Temple of SATURN, near to the arch of SEPTIMIUS. A pillar it was so called wherein all the high-ways of ITALY were cut and engraved thereon, and from which the measures began and went on to every gate of all quarters. Caligula brought a bridge of marble through the Roman FORUM from the mount Palatine to the Capitel. A more flately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City: for the bridge was sustained with four colossal mighty pillars of most white marble: whereof at this day there are to be seen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridge. In the midst of the FORUM, over against S. HEDERIUS Church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horse of DOMITIAN gilded all over. At the foot of this horse was the semblance of RHEA, a river in Germany; for that DOMITIAN the Emperor had triumphed over that Province. And this is the Image which afterwards they called MARSFRUS.

Of the beakheads of the Antis, ships, a pulpit was built in the Roman FORUM by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called ROFTRA, that in the acts of the Senate should be made. Now of this ROFTRA there were two, the new at the bottom of the Palatine as is before said, and the old, near the CURIA in the Comitii. In this ROFTRA were laws published, canthes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same the manner was also to erect the Statues for most famous and noble men.

In the most conspicuous place of the FORUM ROMANUM, before ROFTRA, upon a lion of stone was the portraiture set to POMPEIUS, the fosterfather of Rominius and Romus. For, he willingly did return the tryst between ROMINUS & ROMUS the founders of the City, there being there, whereafter they erected unto him his statue. Behind the ROFTRA was the iepulchre also of Romulus. Moreover before the ROFTRA stood the statue of HERCULES clad in a coat after the Eleancs habit, with a grim and stern comenence. Three flames also of SIBYLLA in the same place. The manner of the Romans besides, was to set up the heads of those that were put to death, there to be seen.

Two or more Council-houses at Rome were: one near the FORUM, built by the Temple of Peace, named HEBBLA; the other in the mount CAVIS, whereof we will speak hereafter.

CHAP. XVIII.
The lake CURTINS, the great sewer, or ditch, and the Doliola.

The lake CURTINS was in the midst of the Rom FORUM near DOMITIAN his horse. This lake took that name of M. CURTINS, who gave the Common-wealth, willingly of his own accord cast himself headlong, armed as he was, together with his horse into a chink of the ground in the midst of the Roman FORUM. Some would have it so called of MATIUS a Sabine, who through this lake escaped safe to his own company. The vault or sink called CASONEX, was made by the commandment of TARQUIN; for by reason that the hills were dug under, and the city flood hollow upon arches, it received & carried away all the filth thereof. At the Temple of FUS STATOR divided it was into three conveyances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopped up, the third runneth with most clear water by the Lake CURTINS, under the Roman FORUM, along the foot of the mount Palatine into VELABRUM, and from thence in a sink made of four-square stone, it discharge itself into TYLER. In old time there there were many such vaults, and those for public use. But after the City was won by the Gauls & burnt, whiles every man made haste to rebuild his house, where he could meet first with a convenient place; they took no heed to the streets as they were before: so as neither the City was divided as aforesaid into quarters, nor yet the finks which in times past went under the streets were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under private mens houses, whereby it came to pass, that each house almost at this day hath a sink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this author, whole epistle or abridgment we write, hath not divided the regions of the City, agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that those things which he set forth down, might be sooner understood, and better remembered, he hath parted it into those quarters as now it standeth and when he sheweth in what part of the City any place in times past was, he declareth them in those costs which at this day are known to the Inhabitants. But as at first those finks were common (as I have said) so there were appointed publick overseers to look into them.

Near the forefaid great sink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Dolida. This place was reputed so holy, that a man might not sit thereupon, insit were supposed to have been certain secret mysteries of Numus. And yet, there be that think verily the ashes of the French Senones were there belowe.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genetrix, The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium and Roman Forum, Cæsar's statue and pillar.

When the Comitium was from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended, we have shewed before, in the fifteenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, and Cæsars statue, and the Roman and Tatius were wont to meet together in this place to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senate and people of Rome assembled, when they would decree any thing for the good of the C. W. and namely, when Consuls, Triomhs, Consulars, and such Magistrates were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was near the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Pala-trine. This Comitium was open above-head for many years: whereupon oftentimes, albeit assemblies were summoned, yet they were empeached holding for them, fearing some tempestuous weather toward. Long time after, when Annibals came into Italy, they set a roof over it: and afterwards Cæsar repaired it again. In this Comitium the places were many times exhibited. In the same (as Lee repor'teth) the books of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner, many lewd and outrageous acts were committed in the assemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speak.

In the Comitium stood the statue of Capitols; which being afterwards carried with fire from heaven, was transfigured into the court-yard of Vulcan. In the canons and angles of the Comitium, were the statues likewise of Pythogoras and Alcibiades: Also in the alcant and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the curia stood the image of Accius, together with his helmet and spear.

The image resembling the Mother goddesses, was let up in the Forum. They that worshipped this goddesses were of this opinion, that the stone whereof the was made, could not possibly be confumed with fire: which they guessed hereby, for that albeit many fires were made in the night especially at her Image, yet it took no hurt thereby; and therefore gave they out, that there was such virtue therein, as I have said. And from hence it came, that in all streets almost they began to worship her and to erect altars and little chapels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genetrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum: Just before this Temple stood the statue of Cæsar, carrying a blazing star upon the head. In like manner a Column of Cæsar made of Numidian marble, so foot high there remained. Before the Temple of Cæsar there was the statue of Q. Marcius in horseman's habit; of Tremellius clad in a side-gown; of M. Attilus covered with a vail.

CHAP. XX.

The column called Mena, the pillar Horatia: the houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian, the Temple and court-yard of the said Cæsar.

In that part of the Forum was the column Mena, where stood the palace of Portius, Called Mena it was, of Mena the Censor: for he (when as he sold unto C. W. his house, and when Flaccus the other Censor gave order, that the palace aforefaid should there be builded, reserved in the sale so much space for himself, as pillar or column would take up: upon the which he might put out aloft to jut forth, made of joists and boards upon them: from which place both he and his posterity might behold the sport of sword-fencers. And this privilege he obtained: whereupon, others also, as many as might be allowed, were as industrious, and builded such columns in the Forum. There stood a rock of stone in the Forum, whereupon the spoils of the three twins Curtiis were hanged.

In like manner the pillar called Horatia. The houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum.

Likewise the court and cloister of Minerva; and the shops of Bankers as well old as new.
The dead corps of Caesar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and interred in that place, where afterwards they built unto him an altar and Temple. Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romans was, to lay down their Magistracy.

CHAP. XXI.

Besides the Temple of Saturn, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the 16 chap.of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the North-east was Caesar's Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest behind the Temple of Faunus, there was the Temple of Venus Caprina, about which Caesar made a cloister and a Forum, not of wares and merchandize to be sold, but for them that required thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statues (whereof there were many and tho' most fair and beautifull) he suffered his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently let out. The very level of the plot floated him in an hundred millions of Ases and above, Caesar purchased with 1500 talents; Paulus Amphilus the Colegiate of M. Marcellus in his Constipship, to be his friend and to stand with him, Paulus having received this sum of money built in the midst of the Forum near to the Temple of Caesar and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderfull Palace, of Phrygian columns which afterwards they named, Basilica Paula.

A Library also the same Paulus erected near unto his own Basilica.

CHAP. XXII.

The Roman Forum, whoe also of [Julius] Caesar and Augustus, were (as it is well known) near one to another. That of Augustus they affirm to have been at the image of Mars, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Caesar, but excellently well adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Caesar and Pollux, with the victory of Alexander the Great; the image also of CÆsar, and of the victor that upon his helmet fought, Allo Apollo in ivory; and besides these other ensigns and ornaments of verse and valour.

In this Hall or Forum publike justice was administered: and the judges from thence were empaneled: wherein they debated in council, of wars, of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with foreign command. Hereafter they that returned victors, brought the ensigns and tokens of their victory. This Forum by time decayed, Hadrian reified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner, Augustus dwelt in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and tairly, but marvellously furnished by his neere liue. And Augustus not able to abate this wastfull perticulity of riches, pulleth it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void plot and cour-yard whereof, was afterwards built the gallery of Livia; which also was called Claudia, Nero cut it down, but Domitian built it up again under the old name.

The gallery of Maximus & Faustina, adorned with divers and sundry marbles well built in old time; whereas at this day standeth the Church of St. Lawrence in Miranda.

CHAP. XXIII.

The washerwoman, called Sororium Tigillum: the street Cyprian, Securatus, and Patricius: the house of M. Antonius.

Sororium Tigillum was a place hallowed for the expiation and afoiling of Horatius for killing his sister, set up near the street Carina, to the honour of Jupiter.

The street Cyprian is near to the cliff or rising of the Capitol, which leadeth to the Church of S. Peter in Vinicula, so called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were arraigned and made free denizens. Hereafter was Scylarus upon the wicked and defiiled act of Tull, whereof Livy speaketh. Some think this was one with the former: others say, it was divers from it.

The street Patricius was so called, because of Patricii, who were by K. Tullius commanded thence to dwell. For this was a place railed somewhat higher than others, from whence all the upper ground, they might easily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, if it should be offered.

M. Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus, After Antonius, the Church of St. Paulus was in the same place built.

CHAP. XXIV.

Bitha Gallica, and Aquemelium.

Bitha Gallica was a place in the heart of the City, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmen that held Rome were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the City where at this day standeth the
The Church of S. Andrew (in Bufr Gallica.) Now they call it by an awk name, Portugallo: and it is not far from the Amphitheatre. Varrus seteth the Bufr Gallica near the Aequinum. As for Aequinum, it was so called, because the house of Melina who fought to be K. was there laid level with the ground.

CHAP. XXV.
The street called Via Sacra: the arch Fabian and Vespasian.

This street beginneth at the old Curti, in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Constanti. Via R. Varrus seteth that it began at the Curti a and the chappel of Stervia. Whereby a man may gather that the Via Sacra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Forum of Caisar, and so directly up to the Palace of the Capitol. The name of S. Mary it took for that the Augustus when they came from the Capitol hill, went through it as they took their Augustior because monthly, they went in procession with sacred rites along that way: or last of all in regard that in there was a league and covenant made between Romanus and Tarit: At the head and top of it, Ancus Maximus in times past dwelt, near the chappel of the Lars.

In this street was the famous statue set up of Clod. The arch Fabian likewise, near the Kings Palace, fall by the Baglia of Paulus, was reared by Fabius the Centor, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the statute with his arms, and other tokens of the victory cut and engraven. Fast by it, Scribonius Libo erected a feast and Tribunal for the Praetor, named Patred.

In the same street-way was the marble arch of Vespasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seen) erected by Vespasian after he had won Hierusalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the ark of the covenant of one side, and on the the other, his triumphs and spoils: and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights, the two tables of Moses, the vessels of the Temple of Hierusalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, whereof Josephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.
Graciatia: Senaculum; the Curti: the Palace of Optimus and Porcius.

Gratia was a place on the right hand of the Comitia, as men go forth of the Comitia; where the Embassadors of forain nations being and to the Senat, used to stand and give attendance until they were admitted to audience.

The Palace of Optimus and the Curti stood near unto the Gratia. Above the Gratia was the Senaculum at the Temple of Concord. Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont there to meet. In Greek it is named Σενακιον. Curti was in the Comitia, and some think it is all one with Senaculum; so called, because the affairs that required publice care were there debated. There was a Curti also of Priestis, where Church-matters were handled and treated of. Now this Curti where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat pats, but in the place let out and appointed by augury. Hereupon Curti Hostilis, Pompeius, and Julius, being professes places before, were by inauguration consecrated Temples. In this Curti was the altar of Victory: and upon the stairs of the said Curti stood the image of Victory, made of fine pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Centorship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the Forum under the Curti, which after his own name he called Portis Basilich. The palace also of Romulus (as men think) stood where the Church is now of S. Mary the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the City, joyned together in one place in a manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Comitia toward the Temple of Peace, and the Church and gardens of S. Mary the new almost as far as the Esquiline.

The fourth Book.

CHAP. I.
The Temple of Janus and Piety: of the publick goal of Rom. Commons.

Seeing that four parts of the City are described, the fifth enueth: which in Indeth those places that comprehend Tybre, part of the Arventine on the right hand, and the rock Trigometum on the left: the valley also which lyeth between those very hills. Wherefore beginning we will at the memorable places, which are next after the Theatre of Marcellus and so run through the plain and levell plot of the City, and with f. st. first, whom men in our time believed to be the very door, and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Numis built a Temple at the gate Camenitaki (afterwards the chappell of S. Katherine) at the bottom of the Argileus, A A A A 3 close unto the theatre of Marcellus. This Temple had two doors: in time of peace they were shut, but in war opened by that Conflui, who, as the worthier part, was first created. It is found in records that this Temple was shut but for the third time by Auretius. But why in time of war it stood open many reasons are given and this is thought the chiefest, namely, an accident that befell when Rom. was preparing against the Sabins: for when the Sabins were now pofted of the gate Carmentals, and about to rush violently into the City, all on a sudden unlooked for there issued forth upon the enemies a plenemic river and stream of not flowing water out of the Temple of Juno, which stood near to the gate: whereupon they were driven to flee, and so the City was saved.

From hence it is that polity coming after, open the doors for Juno that he might be at liberty, when he is called forth, as it were, to help in time of war.

Others report that Taurus and Romulus both were the founders of that Temple: as when, the covenant was made between them, agreed together of that two-faced god as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contract in between two Kings and two nations; and so erected unto him this Temple in that very place where now the ruins of S. Katherine's Church are to be seen.

Moreover there be who affirm, that Confi. called it Tiberium built it; but the variety of their opinions seemeth hereupon to arise: for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Janus worshipped as gods by the polity whereas they in old time believed one: so as that which is spoken of divers is fully supposed, as said one, which may be seen before, whereas we wrote of Janus with four fronts or faces, whole Temple was erected in the Forum. For it is said, that Janus was the first who erected Temples and ordained divine service and ceremonies for the gods; and therefore in sacrifices deferred the first place.

Pourtrailed he is with a key and a wand; as who is the porter to keep the gates, and the guide to direct the wais, Aurelius besides, brought his image out of Egypt to Rome, and in the herb-market built a Temple in the honour of him.

To Picta in the said herb-market, M. Attilius Glabrio dedicated a Temple in that very place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prison: for even there Ap. Claudius the Demetrius by a decree of the Senate built a prison, for that the common goal (whereof we have written before) was not in use; and called it. The prison for the Commons of Rome: wherein himself afterwards being found guilty wrung his own death. In which alio many years after, a certain lady poor woman of baim and ofßure parentage, being newly brought a bed being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to be starved to death. Her daughter, being a much woman and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the gosser, that she might have leave to go to her mother: and when he had made fire to thrust before, whether she brought with her any food; and saw her have nothing about her, let her in: and so the went and came many times. At last, known it was that the prisoner within was nourished by the breast-milk of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered and let free: and both mother and daughter were allowed their bread ever after by virtue of a decree, at the Cities charges and in regard of that kindness and affection of the child to the mother, they consecrated this place to the goddess Dana, Ever IPPoPolet, that it was not the mother but the father in this manner was by the daughter nourished.

CHAP. II.

The herb-market: the Temple of Juno Matuta, and of Hope: the Oratory or Chappell of Numis; the Column called Lactaria: the Altar and Chappell of Carmenta.

This place hath the name of Forum Holitorium, for that therein is great store of herbs and plants without the gate Carmentals, wherein in times past was the old market kept: and at this day called it the street Montanaria.

Within the compass of the said market-place, C. Cornelius the Consul, in the time of the Gauls, vowed a Temple to Juno Matuta: which afterwards being Censor, he put out to building in that very place where afterwards stood the Church of S. Andrew, who named it in Montemus.

The same C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holitorium the Temple of Hope, and the same adorned with divers and sundry marbles: which afterwards Collinus consecrated. Many a day after, it was smitten with lightning: and in the end set on fire and burnt.

A Column also there was in the same market-place, named Lactaria: unto which the sucking bibles to be nourished with milk were preferred. The Oratory of Numis flood in the bottom of Argiletum, near the theater of Marcellus. The Altar Carmentalis consecrated by Evander to his mother Carmenta, flood before the gate Carmentalis.

In the same place also was the Chappell of Carmenta built by the matrons of Rome. At the first, she was called Nicafrata: but for that she delivered Oracles in verse, she took the name of Car-
The Topography of Rome.

CHAP. III.
The fish-market, and Temple of Fortuna Virilis.

The fish-market standeth along the Tybre, near to the [Forum] Junium, between the Churches of S. Mary in Portico and Aegyptiacus, within the gate Carmentalis, not far from the Forum Boarium; i.e. the fish-market.

The Church of S. Mary Aegyptiacus is at this day near the Tybre, and a bridge of the said name. Some go about to affirm and prove that this was sometime the Temple of Mercury others of Fortune and Charity: but all in vain: for those Temples were not in this place, but in the fish-market as for this Temple of Fortuna Virilis, whereof we now speak, it was near Tybre. In it stood the statue of Fortuna, Tullius made of wood and gilt all over, which in a great scare-fire when all things else were burnt, remained only fate and found.

CHAP. IIII.
The Temple of Vesta, the Salins, and the arch of Coecles.

Near the Church of S. Mary surmounted Aegyptiacus, there remaineth at this day a most ancient Temple, now dedicated to S. Sepulchre, the frame whereof is circular, and the pillars are set round about and bear up the roof which being one entire piece of work, carrieth the whole Temple. Confess that it was in old time to Vesta, and Venus, taking that circulart platform, from the Temple which was at Alba made it with a lover in the top, having a hole to give light. However, if this goddess her self there is no image nor resemblance; for that fire, whereof the is the goddes, can have no certain and permanent form. As for Vesta, the Latines call her so, because she is arrayed with divers and sundry things. Of the Greeks she is named *iside, for that her force and power pertaineth to altars and shrines where fire is kept. This is not the Temple wherein the sacred fire is preferred: but that whereof we spake before, which Remulus built between the Capitol and Palatium.

Sulina were the store-houses of the fate which served the City; and they flood upon that bank of Tybre, which is the ford of Temple of Vesta, which reacheth into the Aventine.

The arch of Heraclea Coecles stood at the very root of the Aventine hill, where the rising thereof begins between the mount and the Tybre.

CHAP. V.
The Forum Boarium.

Here, from the beginning of this fourth book, are described those things which on the right hand of the Tybre were worth the noting. Now forward we will alter our manner, run through all the memorable things which are on the left side of that river: and first, as concerning the beast-market. The beast-market was near to Velabrum and Janus, between the mount Palatine and the Greek school, close to the Temple, now called S. Gregories Church. In it there was a most ancient image in brass of a bull, whereupon some think it took the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there: or because they used in old time to sacrifice there kind of beasts there: or else, for that Evander in that place killed an ox in sacrifice to Hercules, for killing Cacus and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments where with the Ministers belonging to sacrifices, the sacrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their sacrifice. In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of sword-fencers.

CHAP. VI.
The Temple of Hercules Victor, and the altar called Maxima.

He round Temple of Jupiter Victor was built in the beast-market, near the Greek school; where sometime Evander reared unto Hercules the altar called Maxima. This Temple (as they say) was so religious and venerable, that neither flie nor dog would enter into it. For Hercules at that time when he distributed a dole of flesh to his followers and ministers in his sacrifice, prayed unto Myrthos | the god that gathereth flies. | He it is therefore that driveth away all fies from this Temple: and at the door thereof he left his club behind, which as soon as the dogs see they run away far off: and thus unto the days wherein Pliny lived it was free from flies and dogs. At the sacrifice and divine service of this Hercules, neither women nor bondslaves, nor yet freed men that had been in villainage might be present. At the last, this Temple was consumed in that fire which Nero the Emperor made.

And besides, Evander erected unto Hercules a statue, which was called, Hercules Triumphant, because so often as there was any triumph in the City it was clad with a mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evander reigned Hercules had no more but an altar which they called Maxima: and this Evander reared unto him for killing of Cacus, and restoring his kine and oxen again, Upon
The Topography of Rome.

Upon this altar he sacrificed the tenth part of the fruit of his kine: for Hercules had given out and promised, That they should live an happy life who dedicated unto him the tenth part of their goods. Hereupon cometh the name of DEMA Hercules, i.e. Hercules' Tithes,

CHAP. VII.
The Temples of Chastity, Prosperous Fortune, Matura, and Fores Fortuna: of the place called Vicus Publicus, Velabrum: and the sepulchre also of Acca Laurentia.

Near to the Temple of Hercules, well known it is that a chappell was built by A'mvs to Pudicitia Parvina, Gentilewomens chastity. Now the image that represented this Saint, stood in the meat-market. To the service and sacrifices celebrated unto this goddess, virgins that were Commoners' daughters might not come. And therefore a certain maiden of commoners degree, reared a chappell also to Pudicitia Plebeia. From the former and sacrifices thereof the Patriline virgins were like wise debarred. Many other places & Temples besides were consecrated to Pudicitia.

The Temples of Prosperous Fortune and of Matura, Servius Tullius consecrated in the meat-market: And that Fo/rune he called Prospera, which was not blind. In that place (say they) an Olive tree sometimes stood and upon a time when honey dropped and flowed from it, the Southerly vages gazed, wherefore a little coffer or box should be made of the wood thereof; wherein those lots were put and laid up, which by the direction of Fortune were either handled or shuffled together by the bands of young boys; as if such should prove happy Fortune, & excellent. Servius Tullius attributed all his acts whatsoever to Fortune, who being born of a bondwoman, had many times found good by her, and was in the end advanced to princely dignity. And hereupon he dedicated Temples to Fortune Primigenia, Mactena, & latera Benejux, and Venerio: as who would say, she ruled and did all. Likewise a Temple heretofore dedicated to little Fortune, signifying thereby, that nothing can happen unto us, it be not small but we must attribute it, as coming from the gods.

A Temple to Matura Comitata vowed in the Venetian war and dedicated it; which long before that time Servius Tullius had erected, To Matura and Fortune Primigenia the Romans did sacrifice upon one and the self same day; and like wise in one and the same day both their chappels were burned and consumed with fire together. Carullius the Consul caused a Temple to be made unto Fo/rune, and Forte Fortuna, near unto that of Matura, of the money railed out of the spoil gotten from the Tuscan.

The street called Vicus Pulchrius began at the Forum Boarium, and went from thence unto the Aventine as far as to the Temple of Juno. In this street near the said Forum was the Chappell of Velabrum, in that very place where now standeth the Church of Saint Gregory in Velabrum, so called.

Aventine hill was sometime separted from the other mountains by the Tyber between, for before that Tarquinus Priscus turned the chanell of Tyber, it brake out many times, and having found a lasting quicksilt beat upon the foot of the Aventine. And therefore of necessity, whatsoever would go to the Aventine was to make a fair, that is to say, by paying his quadrant, terry over thither in a Wherry. Hereupon there place is at this day called Velabrum, a teyriniale, i.e. terrifying over, where sometimes the Tyber had wrought out a fair.

Antius hath left in writing, that the sepulchre of Acca Laurentia was in Velabrum.

CHAP. VIII.
Vertumnus and his Temple: Janus with four faces : the house of Africanus: the Court or Palace Sempronius, and the wool-shops.

Men in old time called Vertumnus not only the god of buying, selling, and of fruits but also him that ruled mens minds, so named a Vertendis, for that oftentimes he turned & changed at his will and pleasure the purpodes and thoughts of men another way: divers. His Temple & image they erected in the Tuscan street near to the altars of Ops and Ceres. The festival days of this god, celebrated in the month of October, are called Vertumnalia. Some there be that have Vertumnus and Janus with four faces to be all one upon this reason, for that they affirm the Temple of Janus afore said was to be in Velabrum, whereas they built that of Vertumnus. But now that Temple whereof we have before spoken, upon four pillars beareth up one roof; and hath four gates besides, and in each forecourt twelve little windows, which signify the four quarters of the year, and the twelve months. In old time they put Janus before, in all sacrifices, and gave him that name ab evando, i.e. going and hereupon the entries and doors of houses be called Janae.

Near the image of Vertumnus, Pub. Africanus had a house, which Sempronius afterwards bought together with the wool-shops, and built the palace which they call Sempronius, near the Temple of St. Gregory in Velabrum.

CHAP. IX.
Argiletus the house of Cornelius; Equilium; the Chappell of Conreddry or sloath.

The Argiletus beginneth at the bottom of the Tuscan street, and endeth at the Theatre of Marcellus. But Fabius Pictor faith it beginneth at the head of the said Tuscan street under Carolus, between between it and the great Lifls, and to reacheth to the Aventine. The name it taketh of a kind of clay or lome, whereof there is plenty in that place: or else of one Argus, who being entertained as a guest by Eumander, laid await for his life, intending after he had murdered him, to be Kand reign himself, but the friends and company about Eumander did over him his trains, and he was by them slain unto him therefore Eumander reared a tomb even there, and consecrated the place.

Now Inma Argus is just by the Theatre of Marcellus. In this street were divers shops of artisans or artificers, and especially of stationers or book-sellers, and those they commonly called the Argiletian shops.

Cornelius Dominicus is said to have dwelt in Velabrum.

Aquincum is between Velabrum and the Capitol, near to the flapers and wooll-shops. The name arose hereupon, for that Sp. Melius, a Roman Citizen who aspired to be K, sometime there dwelt who being detected of that crime, was killed. His goods comissac and his house laid level with the ground, and the plot where it stood by the Romans was made a void-yard.

The Temple of Martia goddess of Idleness was under the Aventine upon the acent of the hill called Circus Paulus, in that part whereas folk go up to the Church of S. Proser. Hereupon the mount Aventine was sometimes called Murtius.

Moreover, some there be that in this place would have the Aflium to stand but we have showed before that Aflium was first built by Rom. upon the Capitol, but in process of time, after that so great riches and wealth was gathered and laid up there in the Capitol, and that otherwhiles the Senate used there to meet and sit in council; the Rom. thought it not with the fift for them that thieves, fellons, and other lewd infamous persons of all sorts, should come for refuge thereto, and there abide: and therefore they supposed it better for their security to translate this privileged sanctuary to some other place. Whereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterwards there began sanctuaries to be set up, not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world.

CHAP. X.

Circus what it is, why it was so called, and for what cause: ordained.

The place where games & exercises of diport were performed, was called the Circus so named, for that the scaffolds were built in circuit round about to behold the puttings: and within that compass the said solemnities were exhibited: also for that the pomp was carried in them, and the horses ran about the goals there. Built it was round, but longwise like an arch or bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apt seats for the beholders, that one should not hinder the prospect of another: in the midst were two marks or goals distant alike one from the other. Also the barriers or curasses so called, because the horses thereon fell and kept in until the Magistrate gave the signal to begin the course.

Now the solemnities of games and plays are festivals in the honour of their gods; for ordained they were first, and still are observed and kept, either for their birth-days & nativities, or dedications of Temples: And at the very first veny were hunting and baiting of beasts, which they called (Munita) to the honour of Saun. But the stage-plays were due to Liber: the Circenian games to Neptune and Ceres. Thus these puttings were ascribed, to some these gods, and others to those; and in honour and memorial of them yearly solemnized. As for the games Circus, they were so called, because when they were to be performed, they had the bank of the river of one side, and swords set to slant the other. But of these games, plays, and solemn fights, S. iun. hath written at large.

CHAP. XI.

The great flow-place called Circus Maximus;

Argusius Prusen instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundation thereon between the two mountains Aventine and Palatine. But Caesar was he that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was,) three furlongs and an half in length, and four acres broad; it is thought that it was Caesar and not Hortian, who let it out to that largeness: and this foundeth like to a truth, considering that in Turgaminus dies the City was not so populous, neither given so much to these fizzes and sights, as in the time of Caesar, and therefore the place required not so great a compass of ground. Now this Circus for three parts thereof to wit the two sides and one of the ends, had a ditch digged ten foot deep; and as many broad: behind that ditch were gallery built three stories high; and there had doors made beneath them, and above of timber: all which galleries had one and the same bales for they closed together round like a globe. Able they were to receive a hundred and fifty thousand men. See more hereof in Dionysius, Pliny, Livy, and others who have written of the Roman Edifices, this Circus Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for he made the barriers of marble, and guided the goals, and many other ornaments he let it out withall; Lastly, when it was decayed and lain down, Tossan reedified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Year and after him, Heligobnus set thereto besides moff fair and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floor with Chyerehoa. But as touching the beauty of this Circus, Nisius wrote much. For, by report it was, that men referred to it, not so much to behold the exercises and maturities there, as the pleasant and delectable beauty of the place, Maximus therefore it was called, either because consecrated it was to, or
The Topography of Rome.

The greatest of the gods, or for the excellency and sumptuousness of the games: or else because in comparison of other Circuses, to wit, Flamininus, and the other called Intimus, i.e., the imperial, this was the biggest. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and one in breadth, so as it would well serve for two hundred and sixty thousand men to sit within it.

CHAP. XII.
The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it.

Conses is reported to be the god of Counsell, either for that he concealeth mens counsels, or openeth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great shew-place covered over which, brokeneth, that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him consecrated. For they, at what time as they consulted about the ravishing of the Sabine maidens, fearing lest they should have been detected before the time, dedicated this altar to this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verified, either by some injury of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued so for a time, as the end it was altogether unknown where it stood. At length found it was again, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of heroic runnings, and then it was uncovered and set open. To this god was the feast also instituted, called Consedia. And those diaports and parties which they devised for the ravishment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Priests belonging to that god.

In like manner, Neptune, named the Chevalier, had a Temple in this Circus Maximus, which in the year of our Lord 1536 was found behind the Temple of S. Amissius, at the foot of the mount Pallatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for such marks and tokens were there to be seen, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptune, the games Circes were by men in old time solemnized.

All for genius the guide and director of secret plots, they directed an altar in the great Circus; over and besides these this Circus contained three other altars: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penates; and a third to the gods of heaven and earth, from whom all things rise and have their beginning. These gods aboveaid, the Romans called Genes, Penates, Presidens, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Coras, and Proserpina, had their Temples about this place called Circus Maximus, which Pothenius when he warred against the Latines, vowed: and the same man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same compass were the Temples of the Sun, and of Flora.

Moreover, a Temple there stood near this Circus, unto Venus; which Q. Fabius Gorgias the Col, caused to be made of the money raised upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing fales with their husbands.

Lucinus dedicated a Temple to Juno near without the great cirque, not far from that place.

In like sort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Maximus.

In Pliny's dates there was seen in the Circus Maximus, the image of Fortuna Seica.

CHAP. XIII.
The Naumachy of the great Cirque.

Naumach is a place so called by dari feris ves ris maxieoni, i.e., for that in it they used to skirmish with ships. For there were places dug deep like ponds, where were represented some shows of naval fight for the exercise of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at sea also. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the cirques only, but also in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XIV.
The two Obelisks of the Cirque Maximus.

The Obelisk (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge and rough stone rising like a spire or broch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might resemble a ray or fun-beam, its growth smaller and smaller in fashion of a steel, with four sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and smooth right artificially. In most of them are engraved and cut certain Hieroglyphic notes, and namely, such as testifieth either the founder thereof, or else other memorable matters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wise: Moreover, the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the ancient authority of the first learning did set forth and mark so. Thus much faith he. Now they drew and portrayed therein sundry forms and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and strange resemblances, whereby they referred and kept for their posterity whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Egypt only, but also in other parts of the world, until such time as letters were found: and then this was given over. At first one letter implied a whole word, and one word went for a whole sentence. But hereof ye shall find much in authors that have written of these characters. Moreover, as Pliny witnesseth, these Obelisks were made of the stone Simies. Them they erected and consecrated.
Consecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sun-beams as we said before. The first that ever deviated these Obelisks, was Cæsar, Metères. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and for beautifull shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforesaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were seen, one standing upright aloft. So foot high: the other lying along in the Naumachiæ: it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, besides the base or footstall, which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hieropolis City of Egypt: but when he would have let it up on end, it fell down and brake in twain. This was hewn out of the quary, by King Samos, in whose reign Pythagoras was in Egypt.

CHAP, XV.
The arch of Settiumus in the Cirqae. The place of the Tabernæ in the Cirque. The floorly house of Pompey, and the fountain of Juturna.

Settium having made conquest of Spata, brought great store of money into the City chamber: and of the spoils taken from enemies, he teared two arches; the one in the behalt-market, called Romanium. But the other in the great shew-place, named Circo Maximus. Upon these arches he set golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them. The house and family of Settium was none of the wealthiest, but yet of great credit and estimation with the Romans. Among whom there was to great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time went and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their (regular) provels and worthy acts they were allowed by the Senate and people of Rome a sancturied by themselves in all the new-places and Theatres, to behold all fights and matters of activity. About the Circo Maximus stood the fleets and brothel-houses, where sometymes harlots and naughty-packs kept such as made profecion of whores; but this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pompey was near the Circo Maximus, and therein was the statue of Hercules erected. The fountain of the nymph Juturna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the Viaburis, near the common fink or vault called Maximus.

CHAP. XVIII.
The Septizonium of Severus.

Here should follow by course after the great Cirque, the last part of the City, namely, the mount Palatine. But because we meet with the Septizonium of Severus, and the arch of Constantine (before we come to Cælar) between it and the mount Palatine, something would first be spoken of them, especially being so excellent building, as they are. The Septizonium therefore is a mighty mount or terrace raised from the plain ground 4 square, compassed about with seven articles, that is to say, courses of rows of pillars one above another, yielding as it were so many porches or galleries; and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the shorter they be. In the midst hereof that was a mile, containing within them certaine hollow places like cabinets. In the top thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of Kings and Emperors deceased. Jul. Cæsar, Romule, nomencl this mount Sepodium, for the Greeks call places much frequented whereupon many waters lead, Hépodoi di vatri, i.e. that is, a way. Pythias calleth it Septizonium, of seven ends or porches. For in every end thereof the columns meet together in the head with marble transeases. Other beams there be besides, reaching inward from the mount to the itself, as every inch course yielded a glass like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Septizonia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Tum in the street called Via nova, of right great antiquity, not far from this of Severus; of which at this day there is to be seen no shew or token at all. The other of Severus, whereof there remain stil one against S. Gregorii Church; 3 Zones of gutelles (as it were) of curious works for the beauty and Hatcheries of the pillars worth the seeing, and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia, and built by Severus himself. That which now is left thereof, leaneth out, as it seemeth ever and anon ready to fall.

CHAP. XVII.
The triumpharch of Constantine the Emperor.

These triumphant arches were erected for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces or conquered great nations, & obtained brave & fortunate victories, seemed worthy of triumph, and therefore upon that they are called Triumphant arches. Upon these arches for the perpetuall and everlasting memorials of these, were cut and engraved the portraits of the very places where the war was performed: the semblances of bricks and ranged battelles, if the service was on land; and of ships if there were at sea. Howbeit, until the time of the Emperors no man raised any arches; and in Plutarch's days they began shew to be builded; so that this of Tum is of all others most ancient. For before, their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in prose of time following, many of these arches were raised: among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the Tell, the corner of the mount Palatine, near the Theatre, beautified with triumpall ornaments, and
The Topography of Rome.

The mount Calix in old time was named Quercus quantus for the number of oaks there growing: but afterwards it was to called one Calix Siberia, a Duke of the Tuscan nation, unto whom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tuscan people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong fenced places which they held, were suspected, commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Tribusa. But such as were without suspicion, kept the hill Calix or Caelium, i.e. the little Calix; a place where sometimes the goddess Diana was worshipp'd: and at this day there standeth the Church consecrated to S. Evangel to the virgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberius was named Angiostis.

CHAP. XIX.

...The mount Calix being on the side of the mount Celius there standeth a round Church, now patronized by S. Stephen, but hallowed and consecrated in times past to Faunus. Faunus he was called, because he foretold things to come by voice and not by signs. The Albans in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day the Church stands of S. Mary Dominica.

In the hill Calix stood sometimes the Temples of Faunus and Cupid, not far from the gate Nervas, where now is the Church of the holy Cross in Hierusalem.

...The Court Heliopolis was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Forum, hard by the Temple of Peace, where King Heliopolis first dwelt, the other in that place, where afterwards the Church of S. John and S. Paul was built.

...A place there was in the mount Calix called Capra Persegrina, toward the Northeast and the Egytus, where at this time the Church of the four crowned Saints is frequented.

...The house of the Laterans also was built upon the same mount, at the Palace or lately Hall of the Laterans.

...The Palace of Florius Constantinus, near the house of the Laterans, stood between the gates Celimentarum and Gabrinius.

...The Palace of Caelinius was built at the gate Nervas, and the Church of S. Holy-cross in Hierusalem.

In the street called Laterancens stood the statue on horseback of L. Vettius, some say it was made for M. Aurelius Antoninus, others for Septimius Severus.

CHAP. XX.
Of the Amphitheaters, and first of that of Statilius Taurus.

Now it followeth to speak of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write thereof, it would be briefly thewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrum cometh of the Greek, and so, i.e. of looking round about: for two prospectes joyned in one, make the form of an hemisphere or half circle. Some think that Titus devised the Amphitheatre first, but some avow and prove, that C. Caesar built the first that ever was in Marsfield: but by the authority of Suetonius it is proved, that Statilius tarred one Amphitheatre before Titus.

...In these Amphiteaters were prizes and rewards prodigous to them that would fight with beasts. Condemned persons likewise yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and fearful sight to behold, for thither were those prisoners brought by the Lictors, within thatenclosure to wrestle and maintain conflict with wild beasts.

Moreover, the Emperors before they took their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in their Amphiteaters fights of sword-fencers at the sharp for life and death, to the end, that the soldiers should be acquainted with fight, and learn not to be afraid of weapons, of wounds, no, nor of bloodshed, nor to draw back and avoid the peril of war to come for the novelty and frageness thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatrum, is yet to be seen near the walls at S. Crofes Church in Hierusalem. And at the same time he built it, when Augustus Caesar encouraged and exhorted the Citizens of Rome, every man according to his ability to beautifie and adorn the City.

The water conduits why they were devised; by what means waters were conveyed into the City, to what purpose, by whom first, and how many.

Chapter XXII.

The conduit or conveyance of Aqua Claudia.

Agrippa began two conduits, but left them unfinished when he died. Claudius, the Emperor of famous memory, took them in hand again, and in most magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely, which beginning at the sources or springs called Carlinus and Curtius, was drawn to the City, he gave the name Aqua Claudia; the other, for difference sake of the two, conduits of Anio he called his own, or the new Anio; and distinct it was from that which is named old Anio. The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Nerva, along the side of the mount Calvisius into the Aventine. A part also thereof Carlinus derived into the Capitol hill.

Chapter XXIII.

Of those things which now in moun Calvisius are not known where they stood.

Brituses the Confal having expelled Tarquin, built a Temple to the goddess Ceres in mount Calvisius, to which goddess also, upon the accomplishment of his prayer and vow, he offered sacrifice. They in old time supposed that she had power over the vital members of the body, and to her tuition they committed those parts, and that she should provide them slate, they did sacrifice upon her alters, and preserved oblations.

Asrippina likewise began to build a Temple to Claudius Cesar, which after her death Sephas finished, and Nero utterly destroyed to the foundation: this also was erected in the same hill. Mamurra Forma, Master of Carri, and Carpenter in France, was the first Roman that adorned and set out his house which he had in Calvisius hill with marble rough cast. Moreover, the house of Claudius Centenarius stood upon the said hill. Also the house of the Tributes, who were two of the thirty tyrants. Likewise the house of the Junior Senators, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountain were confounded with fire, the image of Tiberius remained unhurt. There also is the tower of Ilissus, the market of hymns. In this hill was the great Macellum, the cave or den of Cyclops, the Solimanum, and the armory.
Now follow those places which are worth the remembrance upon the hill Calidus toward the Aventine. And therefore the way of street called Appia we meet with first, which taking the beginning from the arch of Constantine, teacheth as far as Brundisium: and because afterwards it was paved and repaired by Caracalla it took the name of Nova, i.e. the new caufey. But that which properly is called Nova beginneth at the gate of Palatine, and along the foot of the Palatine hill, over the great Circa called Maximum stretceth out as far as to the lowest fish-pool, where now standeth the Church of S. Sixtus. Many other streets there were, called Nova. Take heed therefore that in their names you be not deceived, and let ye think that to be spoken of, one which oftentimes was meant of many.

Between the Church of Sixtus, the fish-pools, and the ruins of the Antonian baths, there was the Church of its Antenitore, built by Antonius Bassianus.

The Temple of Honour and Virtue, not far from the street Appia, was vowed by the father of Marcus Marcellus at Cligidium in Gaul: and seventeen years after dedicated by his son Marcus.

Two Temples there were of Mars, one called the Temple of Quirinus within the City, next to the gate of that name, the other upon the way Appia without the City.

The river Almon runneth along the way Appia, under the foot of the Aventine into the Tyber. It beginneth ten miles from the City in the territory Maximum; which commonly afterwards they called the river of Appius. In this river the goddess named the mother of the gods, was every year wont to be washed by her Priests, called Galli.

CHAP. XXV.

THERMES properly bath the signification from a Greek word, διαβόλος, which betokeneth hot. But we use to call those places which either having hot waters, or without them are heat with a florinth, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat, by the Greek name Thermes. That the Romans used in old to bath and wash themselves other than we now adaeas, is testified by many and divers authorities of writers: and for sundry causes they were wont so to do as yet the manner is amongst us, namely to scour away sweat, or to wash dust off, in like sort for health and pleasure: whereby it came to pass, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in a manner a privat bath or hot-houle by himself: but the same were devised and contrived after divers and sundry sorts. For many publike baths there were ordained for the common people to use at their pleasure, Serv.Octavius inventeth first and made the pendant or hanging baths. But after that riot and superfluity abounded in excess, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keep no mean nor measure as appeareth by the very relics and ruins thereof at this day. And those places where they built these baths and hot-houles they called Thermes; which contained within them divers places, and an infinite number of rooms, bearing sundry names, and serving to as many ues. For some were appointed to heat water (and those were round built) from whence hot water was let into the baths, not to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging aloft: which water after they had done washing being foul and good for nothing was conveyed by certain pipes and spouts into finks. They had other rooms also called Apoditeria, wherein they that were to go into the bath put off their cloaths and laid them by. In the same places were court-yards, having about them most spacious porches or cloisters, built with arched and embowed roofs most stately: wherein were marble pillars garnished with divers and sundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls seceled and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleries groves, and swimming places, all for the pleasure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solace themselves. These delights so drew and allureth mens minds, as that they would wash oftentimes in one day, yea, and in these baths the Princes were wont to sup and bath with other persons whatsoever as it fell out. They had besides private baths to themselves most sumptuously built, and gorgeously set out. And namely, Antoninus Caracalla, at his own charges edified certain baths, which by his name were called Thermes Antonini. The huge ruins thereof are yet to be seen: some of the pillars still stand, others are throwen down. Some say, they were begun only by Antoninus, but finished and adorned by Severus. They stood about the foot of the Aventine, near the street-way leading to Aures, where now is the Church of S. Balbina. Under these baths there stood a most goodly Palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or thew thereof.
The fifth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Etymology of the mount Aventine.

The Aventine is of the Roman hills the fourth in order. The compas and form whereof, because we have already described in the first book, needeth here it is to repeat, but it remaineth to declare, how it came to called, what Temples of the gods, and what other edifices therein. The Aventine therefore, some think, took the name of birds which were wont to fly unto this hill; there to nestle: others, of a King of the Albans, slain and buried there. There be again who suppose, that the Sabines, who being by the Romans enfranchised citizens, there set up and made a god, gave the name to this hill of Aventine, a river in their Province. Varrus affirmeth that it was so called of a serpentine: For as it hath been said a little before, this mount was divided from the rest, and from the City by certain lakes and the Tyber, whereupon, they that would go to it used to ferry over in small punts or wherries. Some guess, that he came to have that name of repose unto it, for that the Latins used in great frequency to repair unto the holy Temple of Diana there. Remus also it was named of Remus who chose a place in the top thereof to sit, to worship the birds of Antony, and in the end there was entered: Romulus therefore commanded that it should not be inhabited, because he would have had it wholly consecrated to his brother. This hill Aventine Marius afterward compassed with a wall, and granted leave to as many as would there to dwell: howsoever, there be some that think that it stood void until the time of Claudius the Emperor of happy memory, as being an ominous place and unfortunat, by reason of foul birds that hasted it, and therefore not to be received within the walls. But the truth is, when the Romans grew populous, they joyned this mountain also to the rest of the City.

CHAP. II.

In the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there standeth the Church of S. Sabina, that very place where aforetime was the holy chapel of Diana. The feast and holiday of bond-slaves was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of August, for upon that day Servius Tullius, whose mother was a bond-woman, consecrated a Temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it to be a festival day for bond-servants, who as yet were patronized by Diana. Some think that this chapel was built by K. Ancius of that money which the Citizens conferred and contributed, who lately had been translated thither from Polieum. This Temple was common unto all the Latins, wherupon oftentimes they retired thereunto. Very near unto that place stood the Church of S. Mary, called Aventine. But in times past the place was consecrated to the goddess Bonna, i.e. good. For Claudius a virtuous virgin or Nun, built a chapel unto her in the honour of Fauna, *sister of Fauna, a most chaste maid.

Upon the same bank and brow of the hill, where at this day S. Aurelia Church standeth, was some time the Temple of Hercules Conqueror. And near unto it another of Juno Regina, built by Camillus with the pillage got in Feii. In the ruin place of Decius the Emperors bains there was a Temple also of Hercules, where the Chritians afterwards consecrated a Church to S. Prisca.

On the side of the Aventine hill stood the chappell likewise of the Moon, as Ovid doth witness. Thus many of those buildings in the Aventine which had a certain place thereupon in our knowledge, the rest following were doubtless in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they stood, it is unknown after so long time; and namely, the Temple of Victory built by the Arcadians, and in honour of whom they offer sacrifices yearly, Minerva and Juno had their Temples there in the same hill, by the testimony of approved authors. To Liberty a Temple was built and dedicated by the father of T. Gracchus, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloister belonging to that Temple was by Atticus Faus and Cornelius Catulus restored and enlarged, and lait of all by Pollia also redified. Now this S. Liberty the Romans honoured above all others, and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever shewed themselves most relitiose and constant.

Upon the same hill, Numa reared the altar of Jupiter Elicius, so called ab eliciendo, i.e. of fetching out secrets and hidden mysteries. In like manner there stood an old altar of Marseus in that hill; now they named Venus Marsea, of the Myrtle tree consecrated unto her; or as some interpret, because Venus, immediate and exceptive, maketh a man to be Marseus or Marseodei, i.e. slavish, foolish, idle, and good for nothing. The Temple of Juno Moneta was likewise built and dedicated upon that hill, Camillus in the same mount consecrated a chappel to dame Macta.

The wood or grove, also called Laurentium or Laurentiae, consecrated unto Jupiter, was there: in which Emperor Valentinian [the second] Son of Constantine, and Gallia Placidia was slain, as Pliny witnesseth,
The Topography of Rome.

CHAP. III.
Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Cacus, by report of the Poets, was the son of Philemon, whom they believed in old time to breathe out of his mouth fire and smoke. This Cacus infected the places near unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a most lewd and theewish servant of Eneas, and therefore the Arcadians called him Eneas, i.e., naught. A cave he hasted, as by very good conjectures, is certainly declared in Aventine toward Tyler, over against the Church of St. Mary Aventina, whereas the river runneth nearest to the hill, and where there hangeth over a vast and huge craggy rock, as if a place as might be to make a starting hole and cave for such an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Hercules had killed and sacrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Inventor, near to the said cave or den.

CHAP. III.
The Armilustrium, and some other things in general.

Armilustrium was a place where soldiers shewed themselves and their armor, and where they used to mutter; where also in their arms they sacrificed and did service to their gods, with refounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximi, but that matters not much. Hither the soldiers used to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armor of their own and in their private custody the Romans had not, to use in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept safe either in the Armilustrium, or the tower or castle upon the rock Tarpeia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scala Gemonia, that is to say, a steep place with a downfall; where wicked malefactors, drawn with a crook, were most miserably executed and killed.

There stood sometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the house of Pallas.

A part of this mountain was called Kemuria; which Kemus chose to dwell in: and being there by his brother Remus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senate and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor; the baths called Decius, and others also near them called Variana. Moreover, the bins of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertini is.

The caves of Remus and Pallas also were in the Aventine, as fables report, Julius likewise dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Catorecordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in general were (by report) burnt in the diies of Tiberius sometime Emperor.

CHAP. V.
The sheared hill, and other things within that compass.

The plain and level ground between Aventine, Tyber, and the City wall, hath four sides, but uneven; in which there rife a little hill, commonly called Tejcatius. The whole compass hereof will hardly be measured with 2000 paces; the height is about 160 foot. It resembleth in shew the form of a square; and the one side of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glass-makers street (and the potters) of the carpenters habitation. And no man doubteth but hereupon arose and grew the mount called Tejcatius. For in old time, as Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adays, much vse there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters; which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's diies there were four colleges or societies of potters: and these made clay, not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and foster their Temples; pillars and walls were by potters work keaded in the outside, ray, the very dead bodies were beftowed in copines of baked clay. Since then, in great store of earthen vessels and potters work much of necessity must needs bebroken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corn-field and pasture grounds, would have made all barren and unfruitful; again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choked up the channell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to fling all that was good for nothing, as fish, ruff, ruff, and broken hearths into one place: whereupon, in process of time arose a mount which they called Tejcatius. Amongst these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrtina, as we find in some records.

CHAP. VI.
The Pyramids; the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

The Pyramids were huge towers four-square, rising up in height, sharply like to a flame, whereof they have the name Sar; Sar, or fire. But Stephanus supposeth they were so called, sa propter, i.e., of wheat, because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of all Egypt: which made a great dearth of corn. There at the beginning were reared by the Kings of Egypt, whereby and to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had no use; for fear lest if they had gathered goods, and hoarded up a deal of gold, silver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some to lie in wait to take their lives away: also, that the common people should not live in idleness. Afterwards, at Rome likewise they bestowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to show their vain-glorious, There is yet one of them to be seen, standing upright at the gate Hustinian, enclosed within a wall. And commonly it is said that it was the monument of Magnifica of C. Cestius, one of the seven Septemvirs, called Epulonae. But Blundus would seem to prove, that it was the place for burial of the whole Colledge and Society of those Septemvirs Epulonae. Now were they called Epulonae, who had the power to ordain and make feasts and solemn banquets to the gods.

It is written, that there were 1,400 garrisons of the people of Rome, between the mount Teutonea and Tybre.

In the same compass of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hilarus.

Some also affirm, that there stood sometime in that quarter a little town called Copena.

CHAP. VII.
The sweated steeple, and the image of Jupiter.

By course the Esquilins should next follow; but because it lieth between the way Labicans on the Southeast side, and the valley (which for the breadth o' 400 feet encloseth that way) on the Westside will rehearse what memorable things forever there be in the Lobican way and the valley aforesaid before we come to the mount Esquilina. In our return therefore to the triumphal arch of Constantine, wherein we took before, we will as we go discruise of the rest. Near them unto this arch there appeareth the half circle or circumference of an old steeple made of bricks, which Victor calleth the sweating steeple: for that the report goeth, how sometime there gushed water out of it: whereby the common people, standing to behold the games and plays in the next scaffolds of the Theatre till they were thirsty quenched their drought.

In the top hereof stood the brazen image of Jupiter, because their ancestors in old time were wont when they made solemn leagues to use the image of Jupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or to send the said image, especially if they were to contract and establish any accords in far remote countries, therefore instead of the compleat image they took the scepter only: which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full and whole.

CHAP. VIII.
The Amphitheatre of Titus Vespasianus. The Temples of Fortune and Quies.

Between the two hills Capitol and Esquilina was there an Amphitheatre. This Vespasian built first, and afterward Titus his son dedicated and beautified it with the bains, built near unto it with right great celerity and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Colossmus, of Nero's Colossum, which was set up in the porch of Nero's house. In the same place of the Theatre were the pooles before time of Nero, whereof we will speak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatre they called also Arcaeges, the Sand Stowe, because the ground was spread over and laid with sand that the wrestlers might fall ioloter and take lefs hurt, also that the blond should be drounck up, to the end that the sword-siers in combat might not be afraid upon the sight thereof, and so with lefs cheerfulness and courage set upon their concurrence: and last of all, that the champions, whose bodies were anointed with oil, being betrayal with the sand, might with more ease take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place it fell within (which during those days of the games was covered over with tent-cloaths) would receive 80,000 men. But hereof seemore in Pliny, Pompeius Latus, and other writers of the Romans.

Fortuna Placent built unto Fortune (after this Amphitheatre) to goody a Temple, as for stature and magnificence there was hardly another in all Rome comparable unto it. Besides it, there were many other chapells at Rome consecrated to Fortune.

Likewise a Chappell of Quinetis and rest was built in the broad street Lobicans.

CHAP. IX.
Of Esquilin.

The mount Esquilin as well by Varrus as others is divided into many parts; and each part thereof took name of those captains who in times past, before the City of Rome was built, there in habited. For one was called Cestius another, Oppius and a third Septius. But hereof Varrus writeth at large. The poettery following changed those names as we shall hereafter hear. Some think that Esquilin took the name of Esquilin i.e. a watch and ward. For when Romulus had no very great trust in Tusculum, he used to have a standing watch by night; for fear he should be secretly forlaid and killed, or else turne out of his kingdom. Others suppose it was so named of hounds, who there used to call forth charger, and such refuce of light corn, to beguile and catch the poor birds.
The side of the hill toward the broad way Lucicana, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vincenti, and S. Martín, was called by the name of Carina as long leemeth to tellifie. From that part therefore, because it was first inhabited, we shall do well to begin our treatise.

CHAP. X.
The Carina, he old Curia and the new.

These Carina, according to their model and form were houses like to keels of ships, standing within the Temple of Tellus. Their ruins are yet to be seen near the Church of S. Peter in Vincenti, i.e. in bonds.

Near to that place was the old Curia built by Remus: but the new was erected near to Compendium Fabricius, i.e. the Quarrefour or cross way of Fabricius.

CHAP. XI.

Here remain yet to be seen the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the Emperors bains, not far from the Church of S. Martin in the hills: for there be great cisterns to receive water, which at this day be called Septem Sole, according to the number of those cisterns: and so far reached the house of Nero, called Aurea, i.e. golden.

Not far from these in the year of our Lord 1506 one Paulus a Citizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the frame of Laocoön made by those excellent workmen, Agesander, Polyclitus, and Athenodorus, Rhodians who with wonderful cunning portrayed and cut most artificially in one entire stone, Laocoön himself, his children and the admirable windings and tendings of the serpents about them. And now at this day is to be seen at the Vatican, in the pala of Veltsian, near the said bains of Titus. See more of this you may in Pliny. As for the story it self, most learnedly and lively it is set out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind these bains of Titus between Eait and North the ruins of others besides are thought very to be those of Philip the Emperor.

Above the bains of Titus, some let Hadrian bains; for that this place is yet called Hadrianum.

By the testimony of Lampidis it appeareth that Balbinus his house was in Carina. There also was Pompey's house, in which Lennas his freed servant taught grammar.

CHAP. XII.
The cliff Viribus, the house of Servius Tullius: the golden one of Nero, and that of Virgil, Metzenas his tower and hortyards: the Temples of Fortune and Felicity.

That part of the Esquiline, which overlooks the Church of S. Laurence in Fontanile, is named Comus Virbi: there also is the grove Fagutae, wherein stood the mansion house of Servius Tullius.

Nero's house called Golden took up all that space, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregory's Church standeth, lay between Conflammator and the Colosseum, the Carina and Esquiline. And it was in the form of a boat, and that it had about it three porches of a mile compass, a piece. It contained also a pool like another sea and was about and resembled a very City. There were to it belonging huts and hamlets country-like, vineyards, pastures, woods, and beats both tame and wild. All these the house and the porches were double guided all over, and set out with precious stones, and in one word there was nothing wanting that might serve for pleasure or prodigious riot.

In the entry of this house there flood an huge image giant-like, called a Colossus, 20 foot high, after Nero's death, dedicated it was to the sun, and then charged the name. Now men think it was called Colossus after his name who was the first deviser of all such statues.

Within the same house, Nero included also the chappell of Fortune. This goddes being made of the stone Phengites, when all the doors were shut, gave light to the whole house within: such rays of radiant brightness asareth this kind of stone from it, this goddes Scarens Tithisthraf consecrated, and of Seferenia standing corn, called her Sela.

At the bains of Colossus there is a street way leading up to S. Antonius Church, in Esquiline, where flood sometime a most noble tower of Mocaeas within his own hortyards: for these most pleasant hortyards were in the plain of Esquile. Here within was Priapus worshipped: upon which ill-favored Idol Virgil both placed much in verse.

Near the hortyards of Mocaeas stood the said Virgil's house.

The Temple of Fidelity, which took up a part of that plot where Nero's Gold-house should stand was by him burnt.

Above these gardens or hortyards of Mocaeas was raised a wonderful piece of work, called Agges Tarquini Superbi, i.e. Tarquinii Butwalks.
The Topography of Rome.

CHAP. XIII.
The Palace of Sisinnius; the plain and market place of Esquilin; the grove Querquetulianus; also that of Juno Lucina, and of Mars; the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

The palace of Sisinnius in Esquilin, stood (as they say) where the Church of St. Mary the greater now is.
The plain or field Esquiline, near thereto of Macenas (called Inner monast.), among the hills, is between the foresaid bulwarks and the City wall. This plot of ground was in times past called Esquiline, because dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the thinking from thereof was no longer to the City, the Citizens and Augusti, far agens general concord, gave the field unto Macenas, where he made his goodly botzards and most dainty gardens. Of which Cicero, with other, speaketh much.

In like manner, the market place Esquiline was in the same hill. That side of the Esquiline which looketh toward the grove Querquetulianus, had in it the grove of Juno Lucina.

In the same Esquilin was the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.
In the way which goeth to the gate Intagriaga, even in the very bulwarks or rampiers of Tarquin's flood the arch of Gordan made of marble, garnished also and let out with ornaments of triumph. Of the ruins thereof was S. Gregorius Church in Domus built.

CHAP. XIV.
The cliff Suburrianus; the arch of Galienus; the bawbles or fish-market of Livias; as some would have it, Livianum. The present way; and the Trophies of Marius,

At the top or upper end of Suburra was the Clivus Suburranus, so called of Suburra, yielding an ease ascent from thence up into the Esquilin.
Anon you meet with the triumphal arch of Galienus the Emperor (where now standeth the Church of S. Vitus) making a goodly show of the Tiburtine stone, whereof it was made. Near unto it was the stall called Macellum Livii, or Livianum. This, as some think, took the name of one Macellus who being a notorious thief, and practising much to steal into the City, was in the end apprehended, and by the Senators condemned, and his house being seized as comfitat to the City was converted to a place wherein they sold meat and all other visibles; and so it kept still the name (as is said) of Macellus. Some are of opinion, that the said house was pulled down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name still of the former.
From hence begieth the port-way Prætoria, and leadeth to the gate Esquilin, in this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick, half ruinatupon which were erected two Trophies of marble; that is to say, certain posts, like Quintini, standing upright with spoils of enemies hanging thereupon, and they resembled men that were taken prisoners. It is said, that these Trophies were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbrian war, which when Silla had call'd down and overthrown, C. Cesar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum. As touching Trophies, look to read more in Plutarch' S. Meriis Max, and others.

CHAP. XV.
The house of the Ælius; the chappell Mariannam; the region or quarter called Tabernola; the bawbles and dwelling house of Gordian; the Palace of Caius and Lucius; also the Palace Livianum.

The house of the Ælius stood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana, and the chappell of that name.
The plain part of the Esquilin, between it and the mount Cælius, and the Basilica Lateranensis is at this day called Maria, in Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.
Near the Church of S. Enfchini, in the way of Præstina, was built the bawbles and habitation of Gordian. The ruins of those botzards are yet to be seen, whereby a man may soon give an estimation how fair, how lately, and large they were at first.
Between the gates Esquiline and Navi, not far from the wall, there be to be seen certain notable ruins; this they commonly call the bawbles of Galienus. But in that place stood, in old time, that beautiful and famous palace which Cesar erected under the name of Caius and Lucius his nephews, Hard by the Church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Bear called Ætolam, stood sometime the Palace Livianum.

CHAP. XVI.
The water Martia or Trajana; and the Temple of Isis.

The current of the water Martia, passing by the gate Trajana through the plain of Esquiline, went as far as to the bawbles of Duciolan, unto the hills next adjoining. This in old time was called Ausonia. It springeth out of the spring Picaria in the mountains of the Peligni, and paffeth by the
The Topography of Rome.

the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and to runneth to Rome; the coldest and most wholesome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Anxan Martius began first to bring into the City: after which, Martius named it Agrippa, and repaired the conduit thereof. It is read more in Pliny and Frontinus.

The Temple of Isis is by P. Victor placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP. XVII.
Of Suburra, the house of Caesar and Livia: and the street Paccius.

Suburra is a street of all other most frequented; it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth forward directly by the Forum Nervae up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Cимвa Suburrae, whereof we have written before in this book: and it endeth where the way Transflunenda beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it rained and bare up the Circus and the wall under it: or because it lay under the old City; or as farro thinketh, of the bourn or street Succoens. In this street Suburra was the house of Caesar, so long as he continued himself with a mean estate.

In it were sometimes certain stews and brothel-houses, as Martial writeth. The street Paccius windeth crooked from the hill Viminale, and endeth at the bains of Diocletian. Of it more hath been said in the former book.

The house of Livia likewise was in the same street, as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP. XVIII.
Of the Plant and the Temple of Sylvanus.

The mount Viminale is on the West-side of it hath part of the Quirinalis opposite against it: and the vale, lying between was named Suburra. The plain.

In the same valley in times past were the ten Tabernae; so called of the number.

The pit also of S. Proba was in the same hill; which Proba her self made near to the Church of S. Marys in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminale, over against S. Agatha's Church there stood the Temple of Sylvanus, as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX.
Of the hill Viminale; the Palace of Decius; the Laver of Agrippina; the bains of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houses of Q. Catulus, Graius, and C. Aquilus.

Viminales recketh the hill Viminale among the Esquilia. Viminale it was named of Jupiter Vminius; whose altars were in that hill; or else of plenty of others there growing. In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there were, in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Lawrence in Pons Fabrica) the Palace of Decius the Emperor, as may be shewed by the ruins thereof.

Not far from the same place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the laviers or washing places of Agrippina mother to Nero.

The bains of Olympias were situate toward Suburra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewise the bains of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminale, where the Church of S. Prudence standeth.

The hill Viminale had also three goodly houses of most noble personages; viz. of M. Crassus, Q. Minus Catulus, and C. Aquilus: the marks whereof are evident to be seen in the side of the said hill.

Upon the same hill in times past a certain festal or public sacrifice was solemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, called Fagual.

CHAP. XX.
The bains of Diocletianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminale; the gate Interagens; and the vale Quinquillans.

The bains of Diocletianus are to be seen all ruint on the side of the hill Viminale: and by their ruins a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. There were begun by Diocletian and Maximinius Herculanus: in the building whereof 40000 Christians were held to work many years together in most stately manner.

There were afterwards finished and dedicated by Constantine and Maximinius, new Emperors. Of the vain and superfluous expenses which the Romans laid out upon Bains, read Seneca, who depaineth out their wastfulness most excellently.

In the same bains was the Library Ulpia, which by Hadrian, or (as some think) by Trajan was thither translated; wherein were the linen records, and those huge volumes called the Ephiphanian books, in which the acts of the Emperors, and all the functions and ordinances of Senate were, as Pope witnesseth.
Behind these bains, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Quirinalis, which spreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is seen as yet the gate Intervalis, which albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth that it stood in the plain Lejavax, in that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vittarium, or the park pit, within which park they kept enclosed divers and lustrous kinds of wild beasts. The harbots and dens of these wild beasts are yet to be seen; wherefore it cometh that those places or parks which are set out and appointed for feeding of Deer, we use to call Vittarum.

The space between Decius's baths and Constantines arch is named the vale Quirinalis in which they lay; that Romulus met with Procris.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

CHAP. XXI.

The hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many signs and reasons may be proved: so as no man skillfull in the Roman Notary, need to doubt thereof.

This Quirinal hill, the flat in order of the mountains of Rome, (as Varro tells us) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus; the other, of the Quirites, who coming with Tarquin from Cures, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long, for it comprehendeth that little hill which is between the gate Collina and Colatina. Upon it standeth the Obelisk of the Moon, engraved with Egyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower now called Constantium.

In the pitch and top of the hill above the Forum of Trajan you shall see the tower called Militarium: where in old time the pillouders of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the same ridge were the baths of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnac-Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinal hill toward Suburra, stood sometime the chappell of Neptune, which appeareth by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do tell.

The house of the Cnudi was built in the street so called, and at this day the name it keepest still, but more hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn: the Sun, and Bacchus; Quirinus his Temple and porch; the old Capitol, the Chappells of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; the house of Pomponius Atticus.

In the Cornelian street (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gigant-like images, called Goliath resembling two old men, naked and holding Cornempias in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the statues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples stood hard by: and many evidences there are, besides the very ruins thereof, which testify so much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mesha. This men think, was the tower of the Sun, by the ornaments there reared and set up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshipped the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this inscription: Sol Invictus, To the invincible Sun. His mother also, a Priest of the Sun, thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the side of the hill near the foresaid baths are two horseteet standing; the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. There were (by report) Tridevis the Kings, and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinal which boundeth upon Vultur Martia was called the mount and Temple of Clarian and Apollo.

Not far from there before this hill, there is another rising and ascent; where, by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitol stood together with the chappell of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva.

Over-against these places, enclinging toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Stefani, Pomponius Atticus dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grand-father, and was called Pompiliana. They write, that this was a most sweet and pleasant seat, by reason of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept always shut to signify that it was an unknown secret: whether Romulus were entered and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in the ven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name: where folks used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesse and contract epoufals.

CHAP.
CHAP. XXIII.
The path-way or causey called Alta: the house of Sabinus; the street and statue of Mamurres; the Court and gardens of Salust, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

The high causey reaching from the baths of Constantine to the gate Pviminalis along the side of Quirinalis was paved with four-square stone.

Upon that causey, at a place called the Pomegranate, Florus Sabinus had an house, wherein, by report, Domitius was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a street of Mamurres: and that his statue there stood where now is St. Sosian Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Salust, and his most neat and fine hortnyards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of those hortnyards, as also of the hamlet Tiburtina, there yet continue some marks and remnants in the bottom of the valley, between the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Scelerata. On that little hill is seen the very house of Salust, which the people there inhabiting call Salustrian, Of this matter see more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the hortnyards of Salust, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount-where in times past the vestal votary Nuns, such as were condemned for incontinency and incest, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto.

CHAP. XXIV.
The Temples of Salus, of Divus, Fidius of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; also the Senat-house of women.

The mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they stand is not so well known at this day, namely, one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabius Pictor, and burnt in the time of Claudius. By Junius Brutus, Dictator, when he triumphed over the Equais it was vowed by him (Censor) put to making, and in his second Dictatorship dedicated.

Salustius, Divus, and Fidius, were the Sabinus gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other household gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (torsoth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they said. Thence three therefore had one temple built upon this hill, and were called by one name, Salustius. The opinion received of which godhead was such, that an oath was thought to carry a great power of sanctity and holiness, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity avowed and swore thus, Me-Divus Fidius, Dominus: a Prætor or Lord Chief Justice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortune Primigenia.

Besides, in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercules.

Likewise the Council-House of women was in the mount Quirinalis; at which in former times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain solemn set daies.

Moreover, it is recorded, that the feast Agonalia was celebrated in Quirinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

Between the hill Hortorum (whereof you may read before in the first book and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis there is a valley four-square, but lying somewhat in length. In that part thereof which lies under the mount of Clatria and Apollo, was the Court called Archimomium. For the very Church of St. Nicholas, which at this day standeth upon that place is named De Archimomio.

Not far from it there is another place, to wit, Pila-Tiburtina: There stood the house of Martial, as he himlieth witnesseth.

Next to it followeth the round Circue (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the godess Flora, the feast called Flora is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous courtesan or trumpet at Rome, who having by her whoreship trade gathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her will she made the people of Rome her heir, with this condition, That every year they should celebrate the memory of her birth-day. But the Senate thinking this a ridiculous mockery, to honour and dignify so filthy a thing with such a remembrance, they devolved the goddes Flora, and called Florae, and upon those holidays, they seemed to please and content, that she would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowing and blooming time. To this goddes we read that a Temple likewise was consecrated: Anon you meet with the work-houses where they make Minium, Vermillion, Near unto which was the Clivus Publicus.
The Topography of Rome.

CHAP. XXVI.

The hill Hortolorum, the Temple of the Sun, and the sepulchre of Nero.

This little hill (Hortolorum) containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Pincius, a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in these days are called Mount Pincius and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and marks of his house are seen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the fame walls we meet with an huge building in form of an hemisphere or half circle, which men imagine, was the Temple of the Sun.

Upon the same hill over-against the tomb of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, built by the monument of Domitian stood Nero's sepulchre also.

Now this hill Hortolorum took the name of certain hortyards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reason they were continually so well watered were most fruitful.

Down this hill all they were wont (in times past) to descend into Campus Martius, who meant to sue and stand for any Magistracy.

CHAP. I.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in general.

That it may be underfooth more certainly in what place of the plain and level part of the City every thing stood, let there be a straight and right line drawn from the Capitol, through Pantheon to Tyber, near the Church of S. Roch. So shall the City be in manner divided into two equal parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentana, along the foot of the two hills Quirinale and Hortolorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatre in Greek word it is, and in Latine may be aptly translated Θεατρον. The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and those in regard of husbandmen, who on festival days visited the Temples of the gods: afterwards at Rome they began to be taken up.

The first, and that the greatest of all others was built of timber by M. Scarrus: for, the concavity within would receive 8000 men. After it, were Theatres made to turn about and and shew their front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassiodorus and Vitruvius, who have written plentifully thereof, and namely, by whom they were first ordained, and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.

The Theatre of Marcellus, and the Library: the gallery and court of OStavia.

Aegius built many things under the name of others, as we find written by authors in sundry works. And among the rest was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or cousin by his father OStavia. A part hereof is yet to be seen between the Capitol and Tyber, where now standeth the palace of the Sabel. It was able to contain 8000 men. See more thereof in Aegius.

Hard by the very same Theatre was the gallery of OStavia, teared by the said Aegius for his father OStavia's sake. Therein were certain curious pieces of work wrought by Vitruvius and name, the ravishing of Proserpina. The portraiture of Bacchus & Satyrs, &c. Apollo, Diana, and the nine muses, the worksmanship of Timarchides. Within this gallery or walking place, Pnyx faith, there stood a chapel of Juno, and the image of the said goddesses. Fait by the said gallery flood the court or place of OStavia, and in it Capid portrait with lightning in his hand. It took up in times past as great a space, as at this day the Churches of S. Nicholas in Carcere, and S. Mary in Pincien.

After the death of Marcellus, OStavia his mother set up a library near his Theatre. Now the first that ever ordained. That books of all learning should be in some public places bestowed for to be read of all that would come: was at Athens Pnyx the tyrant, and at Rome Aegius Pollio.

CHAP. III.

The Cirque or show-place Flaminius, and the Temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminius flood in that place where at this day the dark stone-houses and cafes are build by S. Katharine church, the marks yet remaining tell us Flaminius was called, either because it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminius, or else by Flaminius the Cit, who was slain at the battle of the lake Trasimensicus. In it were the plays and games exhibited, which they call Apollinares: and therein the horse-racing were performed. To it the Senate used oftentimes to come down from the Capitol to sit in council. Neptune also had a chappell there.
The Topography of Rome.

The Apollo Temple was in that very place, as it evidently appeareth, where now S. Mary's Church is under the Capitol, between the herb-market and the Cirque Flamininus, near to the gate Carmentalis.

CHAP. III.

The Temples of Vulcan, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Jupiter Stator: the column or pillar Bellica; the altar of Neptune; the gallery Corinthia; and the Colosse of Mars.

Within the Cirque Flamininus stood most famous Temples of the gods, to wit, of Vulcan, Mars, and Bellona, to wit, that which was toward the gate Carmentalis. Before the said gate there stood a marble pillar, which the Romans called Bellica, for it shewed when war was to be made. The Romans in old time used and retained this manner in proclaiming war: The public beadle, or one of the heralds, placed a spear with some other ensigns of war, in to that land upon which they meant to levy arms: But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftentimes to give defence to nations far remote and distant because they should not need to fling a spear or javelin, as I said before, in that land they did but stick one in the pillar abovenamed, on that side which regarded that part whether they were to make their expedition.

To Hercules the Great, protector and keeper of the cirque Flamininus, they built a Temple in the same place: for his statue was there erected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now standeth the Church of S. Lucy in the dark Apotheke.

M. Fulvius built another Temple of the allowance that he had of the Censors' flocks, to Hercules Munorum: for he had heard in Greece how Hercules was Magnesius, the leader and companion of the Muses. The same Fulvius transfigured the images of all the Muses out of the town Ambraecia to Rome, and consecrated them under the protection and safeguard of that most potent and mighty deity, to the end that they might have mutual help one of the other: namely, the quietness of the Muses by the defence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Muses. This Church much decayed and disfigured by time, Martinus Philippus, Augustus, his father in laws, and his mother husband repaired.

In the same Cirque they would have the Temple of Jupiter Stator to stand.

There also (as they gather by certain presumptions) was the altar of Neptune, which in old time was ablaze.

Obelins reared a porch or gallery built and born up with brazen pillars, and thereupon named Corinthia. This stood between the Cirque and S. Nicholas Church, and was also called Chalcias, i.e. brazen or copper.

The Colos of Hecules of Mars, at the Cirque Flamininus, was in the Temple of Brunus Callinus.

CHAP. V.

The porch or gallery of Mercury: the Theatre of Octavius: his house, cloister, and gallery: and the Temple of Venus Victrix.

Between the Cirque Flamininus and the Tyber, in the very entry of the Church of S. Agnes in Piscina there is a porch or gallery, consecrated sometime to Mercury, or, as some would have it, to Juno. This being consumed with fire, L. Septimius Severus reedified. But the porch which standeth in the Jews street called Curia, they say was built by the Emperor Severus.

Between the gallery of Mercury and the mound reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first that built a Theatre to continue. For all others before were taken down when the games and theirs were once done and past: and when need required, new were set up. A great part of this Theatre, when Pompey had finished, was covered with the roof. Afterward, Theodorick, K. of the Ostrogoths redidified it. This also received eighty thousand men.

Near unto this Theatre there was a court or natally Hall called Atrium, the same which at this day they name Saturnus; also the house of Pompey & a porch before it. These edifices of Pompey, at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plays, were consumed with fire. Near to the same theatre the emperor Claudius of famous memory, reared an arch of marble for memorial of Titius Cesar.

In the forefaid Theatre (men say) was the Temple of Venus the Victress.

CHAP. VI.

The baths Agrippinae: Pantheon, and the portico thereof; also the Temple of good speed.

From the arch of Pompey, as you go northward, you shall meet with the baths Agrippinae, the marks whereof are seen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Chamberla. Now, Agrippina they were named of Agrippa who built them: See Pliny hereof in his discourses of Nature.

Near unto the forefaid bains, there is a Temple of greatest antiquity, and among other old Temples of the city, the noblest of all the rest, which at this day remaineth in manner whole and found. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name is Pantheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe. At this day they call it S. Mariæ the round. Of this the temple, Pliny and others have made mention, unto whom I refer the reader. In the very porch and entry of this temple, and of all others, were the statues of Augustus and Agrippa. The images of Mars and Venus. At the lappet of Venus cer, there hung a pendant that most costly pearl of Cleopatra. Likewise there floated the image of Minerva, the handy work of Phidias. Moreover, Hercules at whose statue the Carthaginians in old time used yearly to sacrifice mankind. They ascended to this temple as in the rest, by many steps; for men in times past used to rear the temples on high and made but one way to go into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined a piece of work worth all admiration, which of some was called Prothesis. For this word, Porticus, betokeneth nothing else but an ornament or porch. The holy places, before the door, Herod also have authors written much. This temple first Hadrian the emperor of happy memory, and afterwards Antoninus Pius, repaired. Certain relics and remnants of all these and somewhat long, of Good-feeding temple, are evidently seen in the streets of Minerva and S. Eutychius. This god was long ago worshipped, that all things might fall out happily in the end. Portraied he was in habit of a poor man, holding in his right hand a charger, and in the left an ear of corn.

CHAP. VII.

The baines of Nero and Alexander: the Circus named Agon.

Bhind S. Eutychius church, between Panteleon and Lombard street, the remains are seen of the baines and vaults of Nero.

Nearer unto these Alexander built others near by conveyance of water into them, which they called, Alexandrina and their very few and scanty. Whereof Lamprius hath written much. Neer unto them (some think) were the baines of Hadrian: and they would have them to stand in that very place where now is St. Alphonsi church.

In the plain part of the City there appear most evident tokens of a long and spacious Circus, which they call at this day Agon. It took that name either of the games Agonalia instituted by N. Numa in the honour of Janus, which in that time place are represented the 9 day of January; or because all manner of such festivals and shows, called by the Greeks Agones, were wont there to be exhibited, some have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reason, that other ornaments of theirs were to be shewed there. For the manner of the Princes and Emperors was, ordinarily to bellow their monuments and memorials in one place.

CHAP. IX.

The temple of Neptune, Terentus: the Altar of Dis or Fl duo: the marish Capre.

On the side of Tyrce, where now S. Blase Church standeth, sometimes Neptunes temple stood. The same was rebuilt by Hadrian. Therein were the painted tables hung, were represented the shipwrickes, Terentus is a place in Marse field, so called, for that in it the altar of Dis was hidden; or because the water of the Tybre running thereby, eat away and wore the banks of that side: or lastly by occasion of Eunander, who arrived with a fleet in that place and there abode. There also in time of the Alban war, they hid the altar of Proserpina under the ground, that they only might have knowledge thereof, where it was.

In the same Marse field (some think) was the fen or marish Capre, where Romulus in a tempest which sudenly arose, was taken away. Of which matter Livy writeth.

CHAP. X.

The house Corvina: the bowm way or gate: and the temple of Isis.

The second part of the flat City, reached along the foot of Quirinalis, from the Forum of Trajan to the gate Flaminali, in which part near the Capitol, was the house Corvina, built by that name and family, and to this day keepeth still the old name; for commonly called it Marseelium Corvinae.

From that house unto the bars or rails in Marse field, extended the way Lata, retaining yet the antique name and there standeth the church of S. Marcellus in the broad way.

In the same way stood sometime by report, there apie of Iris near the rails above-aid, where now is the church of S. Marcellus. Now this Iris was a goddesse of the Egyptian, she was honord and worshippd allo at Rome, together with Osiris named Scrope, as whom the publick pliace in the quarter Flaminali, Iunon, Sraepen s bare the name, It happen in the temple of Iris that image was committed; whereupon the Emperor Tiberius cast the Priests of that temple to be crucified, & the place itself to be demolihs. Other temples of this goddesse there were at Rome, for Caracalla translaed all her sacred rites and ceremonies to Rome, and daily with exceeding great reverence observed the same.
The Topography of Rome.

CHAP. XI.
The Arch of Camillus: the temple of Minerva; and the Swine market.

As a man goeth down from the broad-gate aforesaid toward the Pauheon, he shall see a most ancient arch. Some think (but untruly) that erected it was for Camillus: for many a fair day after his time, these arches were in no request and use: and therefore it belonged to some other L. Generall. Between this arch and Pauheon, Cn. Remmius built a temple to Minerva, wherein he comprized in a compendious sum, the memorall of his arts and exploits. Other enigneis also in the honour of the City of Rome, he there set up, and those he garnished and adorned. Whereof read more.

At the foot of the mount Quirinale, in the bort-yards and the Colonnemce, near to the sleete and rising of the hill which leadeth now into the mount Caffallis, there was sometime the market-place Swarumus, so called of selling of swine there. For Vero witnesseth, that in old time they had certain fet and appointed places for the selling of certain things, and thereof the market tooke the name. Thus of oxen, the market Boarium; of hogs, Poconium; of swine, Swarumus; of woods and herbes, Holitourum, was called, &c.

CHAP. XII.
Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

Oraasmuch as in the former book it hath been sufficiently declared as touching Mars field, where it lay, it shall be needfull to make any repetition thereof in this place: but why it was called Martius, would be here in briefe consider'd. Named so it was, because it was consecrated to Mars: for when the Tarquins were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or standing corn they were possessed of, they divided amongst those Citizens who were not landed at all, reserving only this field Martius; because it was consecrated to Mars, that in it the games and places should be solemnized and the youth exercised, they thought that the fruit also there growing should likewise be counted sacred and secured, and so deemed it unlawful that any distribution thereof should be made, but threw it all into the Tybre, whereof stood the land called Tyberinus, of which we will speak in the last book. In this field therefore (besides the native beauty of the place and the delectable sight of the meadows) were erected the ornaments and statues of brave and renowned persons: yes, and out of the very Capitell (when the place began to be peftered and other-straight by reason of somany ornaments which hitherto were daily brought, many of them were from thence translated into Campus Martius. This field was called of men in old time, Tyberinus, like as Tybre also was named Martius.

CHAP. XIII.
The porch, the temple, Column, and Palace of Antonius Plus: the rails or enclosure called Ovilia.

Between the Sciarra & Pambone streetes, next to Saint Stephens Church in Trullo, there stoodeth a hately porch, which most men suppose was that of Antonius Plus, for that his temple standeth so neere. The Column alo of Antonius is not far off. This he raised of an exceeding height with winding and turning fairs, like that of Trajanus, whereof we have spoken before, between this Column and the porch, the said Emperor had (by report) a goodly palace. Between the said Column and the water Virgo, they say, the rails or enclosure within the Mars field stood, called Sepia. Now this place was enclosed within wooden rails, and strongly fenced with walls on every side, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magistrates they were to pass their voices were kept close: and for the resemblance of sheep pens, Ovilia of some they were called. By Livy they are set down, near the wales Forcicata and Flaminia.

CHAP. XIV.
The hill Citaturum: the Villa Publica, temple of Neptune, and the bridge in Mars field.

Between Antoninus Column and S. Laurence church in Lecina, there is raised a mount, called now Citaturum, for Citaturum: not it was a mount indeed, but because the people of Rome, when in the choosing of magistrates they were to give their voices, as they were cited, went thither as it were into some hill. Some say it was called Aceptorum, of taking the peoples suffrages: others Sepianum, for the vicinity of those Septia before said. This little mount, there be that would be to rise and increse by the ruins of some porch or lately gallery, or else of the common Hospital, called Villa Publica. For there was in times past a place called Villa Publica, a large building in manner of a court or hall; wherein were received and entertained all ambassadors of enemies, who might not be allowed either to enter into the City, or go into the publick lodging or Hospital called GraecoThalia.

Next to the Septia, M. Agrrippa (as Denis writeth) built a goodly temple with a most beautiful porch to it, in the honour of Neptune.

At this foresaid hillock called Citaturum, and the Column of Antoninus, there was a bridge built by

by the Sept., whereupon they that were cited, when they had given their voices, passed by and went their ways: and so were favored from the rest that were to give their suffrages, because they should not be entangled amongst them not be able to shew unto them, on what side they had passed their voices.

In the same Mars field, it is recorded that in times past stood the temple of Piety, even whereas now the church of S. Savior.

CHAP. XV.
The water Virgo: the lake and chapel of Intuiria, as also that of Piety.

The water Virgo, which retaineith still the pleasant sweetness to the taff in drinking, and keepeth yet the old name, beginning to gather to an head near the bridge Salarum, and being carried in a molyd deep gutter entrench in the City at the gate Colling, and so is raised to the hill Hortulorum: where, by arched work it is conweighed through Mars field, and yealds all the way to the habitants, water for their use; and endeth at the length in the hotyards of Lucullus.

Moreover in Mars field, there was (as men say) a fountain and well or cistern of Intuiria, sister of K. Titus, yielding most holome water. This water-Nymph, they avouch (and that right well) to have been called Intuiria, ajudicai, i.e. of helping; because she was thought to help the sick. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Larreglio.

CHAP. XVI.
The arch of Domitian: the obelisk of Mars fl. Id: the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperor.

The triumphal arch, so dismembered (as it were) and bereft of all his ornaments, standing between churches of S. Sylvester and Lawrence in Lucium, and taking up a specie of the way of street Flamia, is attributed to Domitian the Emperor. And hereupon besides others pælations) they appropriate it to him, for this emperor reared many inarches in every place.

The Obelisk also there is in this Mars field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a City in Egypt to Rome. Besides, the native eniages and wonderful hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with of the own, therein to be seen, Augustus adjoined other ornaments no lefe or mirable. But hereof it is better to read Florio.

Claudius the Emperor built near the Septia in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked adorned with fair statues and mottt beautiful columns.

CHAP. XVII.
The vale Martia; the palace: the porch of Augustus: the Naumachie of Domitian and the temple of the family Flavia.

The vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius: it lyeth between Tybre and the hill Hortolorum: within the which, in a place lower than all the rest about it, appeareth the Naumachie of Domitian; where in old time he exhibited shows of naval battles, in which place before-time likely it is, that Augustus had his Naumachie; which being cleansed and coursed by Domitian, retained afterwards his name. Read Suetonius.

Next to the Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kinred Flavia. In this place, Julius Capitolinus proved that the porch and palace of Augustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.
The Mausoleum of Augustus: and the two obelisks near it: also the tomb or sepulchre of Marcellus.

In the vale Martia, between the way Flamia and the bank of Tybre, hard by S. Rocher church, Augustus made a Mausoleum, to serve for a sepulchre as well to himself and all the Emperors, as also for his whole house and name. This building is like unto a tower standing at the gate called Populi, which flewe through it, till spoiler now of all the ornaments that set it out. Men would have it to be the sepulchre of Marcellus. And Augustus, named this sepulchre of his, Mausoleum, for the resemblance it had of that of Mausolus K. of Caria, which Artemisia his wife built for him. Read Caffodoro Sbrabo, and others thereof.

Close unto the Mausoleum of Augustus, were two obelisks, as the ruinous remnants thereof do tell of.

CHAP. XIX.
The way Flamia: the Trophees of Martius: other goodly ornaments of the field Martius in general.

Neus Flamia, the colleague of M. Ulpian, having vanquished the Ligurians paved the caulis and street Flamia. This was led from Placentia, through Narnia, Fucignum, Nuceria, Callinum to Fortunae temple, to Pisaurum, and so forward to Ariminum, Sec Livy and Suetonius.
The seventh Book.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybris.

It should follow by due course and order, to treat of Ianiculum and all that quarter of the City on the other side of Tybris: but because these parts are separate from the rest of the City by the river Tybris between; thereof also it is meet to say somewhat briefly. And first verily the reason of that name should be showed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tybris, for she rose. For the Sicilians when in so old time they had overcome the Carthaginians in battle, and taken a number of them prisoners, employed them, for the better fortification or their own City, to cast a trench about it, and to let water thereunto: and this ditch in reproach of their enemies, they called Tybris. And the same men upon a time afterwards, when they encamped near Rome, gave this very name unto this river also, whereas before it was called Albula. Some think it was named so of Tybris a King of the Tuscanians, slain upon the banks thereof. Varro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tiberius, a neighbour Prince of the Veientians. In holy writings we read it Tybersius. In vulgar speech they call it Tybris: in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Rumnun, as it were, gushing and eating the banks thereof. Also at one side of the City it was named Terentius, as a man would say, wearing the banks. It springeth from the Apennine, above Aruns. At the first it is but small and shallow, but before it entrieth into Rome, it having received 40 other rivers is increased to such a height; that ships of burden and the greatest hulks may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tuscan from Fabriana, the Sabines country and the Latins, entrench at the North part of the City, and so paffeth through Southwards, between the gates Hoeisena and Portusena, leaving Ianiculum on the right hand and the City on the left, and so near unto Habis is discharged into one main broad stream, and falleth into the Tyrhenian sea. Upon the banks thereof, as if they were consecrated to some divine power, it was not lawful to set up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the chanell and the banks. But of this river, Flumy and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II.

Of the bridges built upon Tybris.

The Tybris, as is above said, being so deep as that it is navigable, and beareth the greatest ships, hath no flood in any place that can be waded through; and therefore necessary it was to make bridges over it, and so to join that part on the farther side of Tybris, to the rest of the City, Hecules, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridge, where afterwards stood that which they called Sublicins. Also before the foundation of the City, there was a bridge over Tybris, called Scasar, upon which they sacrificed men to Saturn by throwing them down into the river. But when Hercules afterwards had put down that manner of sacrificing, he gave order, that men in images made of reeds and bulrushes (which they called Arges) should be cast down in stead of them. But after the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Miltius, Alius, Vaticanus, Ianiculensis, Coetius, Fabriican, Palatianus, and Sublicins. And all these, save the Sublician only, Tullius overthrew.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Miltius.

The bridge Milvius, which men now call Miltius, landerth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the troublesome times of Silla, by Scaranus when he was Censor. Many a time they say it was cast down, and as often set up again.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Alius, now S. Angel, the Vatican or Triumphant the Ianiculensis or Aurelianus.

The bridge at this day called S. Angel, in times past Alius, took that name of Alius Hadrianus, for he built that brdg, and near unto it a temple, which they call Meles Hadriani. Beneath...
Beneath this is another which giveth passage into the mount Vatican and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Vaticanus: also Triumphalis, for that over it they went up in triumph to the Capitol, to give thanks to Jupiter and rejoice. The piles are yet to be seen in Tyber, over against the epitile or the Capitol of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Luculentus of Ianiculum near unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia, or the gate so called. Antonius Pius paved it over with marble, and being demolished in the civil wars, was called the broken bridge. Afterwards Pope Nysta the fourth redid it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. V.
The brigdes Fabricius and Cestius.

Beneath the bridge Aurelia, one furlong, over against the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very middle of the channell of Tyber, there appeared a shell or island, this was united to the City by the bridge Tarpeus, so called first of the rock Tarpeianer unto it, afterwards Fabricius of L. Fabricius, who by that bridge conjoint the City and island together. The same at this day is called the bridge of four heads, taking the name of four marble images with four faces speece, standing at the entry of the bridge, but that bridge which cloeten the said island with the part within Tyber, was called Epodumiius or Cestius in times past, but now S. Bartholomew bridg.

CHAP. VI.
Of the Island Tiburtine.

Of this island beginning, we have treated before in the description of Mars field, Livy and Dionysius let down this story at larg. It resembleth the form of a bireme galle, and where it is broadest, it is not above a yard floor over, in length containeth about two stades or a quarter of a mile. This was in times past called Lyncaenia, and was hallowed to the honour of Aesculapius, whose image out of Epidaurus was thither brought. Of Aesculapius and his temple read Plato.

A temple also of Jupiter blandeth in it, dedicated by C. Servilius the Daunvmir, which had been vowed by L. Virius six years before the Gauls war.

In the same island were sick folk prented unto Aesculapius (in the field.) And neer unto the facade god, was a lazar-house, for that this god was the inventor and maintainer of Phystic.

In it also flood the chappell of Fanum, neer to the very river: burghcarly remain there any tokens theretofor. This Fanum (as men say) was reported to have been the first that consecrated chappells and temples to the gods, and for this cause, all such places consecrated to the gods were called Fanus. By the testimony of Cornelius Tacitus and Suetonius the name of the emperor Tiberius flood there.

CHAP. VII.
The Senators bridge called also Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

Beneath the abovenamed island, as it were a dart cast off, was the seventh bridg, Senatorum ponts, of the Senators, also Palatini, of the mount Palatine neer adjoining: and at this day named it the bridg of S. Mary in Egypro, by resion of S. Mary church neer by.

Now followeth the last bridg Sublicius, and which also is counted the most ancient of all others. This was first made of timber by Ancus Martius at the very foot of the Aventine mount: framed only with a floor of planks without any iron spikes and nails or props to floor against it: so as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in pieces one from another. Now Sublicius was called a Sublicius, i.e. great strong posts. But afterwards Aurelius Lepidus made it of stone, and thereupon named the marble bridg. Upon it in old time fat beggars craving of alms of the passengers. From it also lead and wicked malefactors, were thrown down headlong into Tyber. This bridg as well as other, was often demolished and built up again by one or other.

CHAP. VIII.
Of that side of the City which is beyond Tyber. The City and temple of the Ravenauns and Fors Fortuna: the baths of Severus: the hort-yardts of Caesars the water Alletina, & the medows of Matrius.

The region beyond Tyber in old time had the name of Ianiculum, the hill which overlooketh and commandeth the greatest part thereof. We find it also called of men in those days the City of the Romans, who with a fleet having sided the Romans, were permitted to dwell in the Ianiculum, for fear lest at any time that mountain and bold should be seized and kept by the enemies. Now for as much as this quarter was inhabited by bale people, such as followed vile occupations, they were in it but few things worthy of any remembrance. Severus therein built certain baies: Caesar made hort-yards and prepared also a fair pool called the Naumachie for ship-fight there. Also the temple of Fors fortuna, was (in Tib Caesar days) dedicated in that quarter.

The water called Alletina, was derived out of the poole Alletins, by the high way or course.
The Topography of Rome.

Claudia into the foresaid Naumachia, and served all those parts. This water was also called by some, Anguis. See Frontinus, who hath written much of the Roman waters.

Marius, who willingly had exposed and offered himself to die for the love of his country, was for that good service endowed by the people of Rome with land on the other side of Tyber. The place at this day is yet called Prata Major. Neer unto the Arsenal and ship-docks on the side of Tyber, were the playes and games of Fishermen in times past celebrated.

CHAP. IX.
The sepulchre of Numa, and Cæcilius the Poet. The Tribunal of Aurelius, the Ianiculum, and the hot-yard of Marcellus.

That the sepulchre of King Numa was under the hill Ianiculum a chart of his, with his books long time after digged there, do sufficiently prove. See Livy, Suetonius, and others.

The Tribunal Aurelia, and the Arsenal was on that side of the Tyber, as appeareth by those authors. The hill Ianiculum took the name of Ianus who there dwelt. & therein was afterwards buried. He also built a town or City there, as they say, so called, This Ianiculum was also called Antipolis as Rome Saturnia.

Commonly also it is received, that Cæcilius the Poet was under the same hill Ianiculum buried. Martial the Poet, as himself testifieth in his first book, had most pleasant and delectable hot-yards in the same Ianiculum.

CHAP. X.
The hill and field Vaticane, the temple of Apollo and Mars, the Naumachia, the cirque hot-yards, and Obelisk of Cæsar.

The mount Vaticane and the plain thereto, were without the City, on the parts beyond the Tyber, and in that very place, where at this day is the church of S. Peter, and the Popes palace. Called it was Vaticana, of the god Vaticanus who chiefly instruct and inspiration was believed in old time that propheseys were delivered. And this god they called Vaticana, for that in power was the beginning of man's voice, as much for infants, so soon as ever they come into the world, presently pronounce and utter the first syllable of this god name. W.

The temple of Apollo was in Vaticane, in that very place, as men think, whereon at this day is S. Peter's or Parnells church, also another of Mars, wherein standeth S. Marzio in Februario, upon the portway called sometime Triumphalis, Cælinus writeth, that Julius Pánthus the Poet had hot-yards in the Vaticane.

The vale Vaticane is therealso to be seen, wherein Nero enclosed a compass of ground like a ring for to ride and race horses in. The conventicles also and wine-taverns there be adorned. Moreover, Nero had hot-yards in this place, which he let forth for divers and tunny punishments and tortures of Christians. All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque. Also the pools made for ship-fight, called Naumachia were there, and the Obelisk of Cæsar in the way Triumphalis yet to be seen standing upright.

CHAP. XI.
The way or streets Triumphalis, the water Sæbatina, the sepulchre of Scipio.

Of the Triumphall way, there hath been some mention made before. Called it was for, that the solemn pomp of triumph led to go that way up into the Capitol. Thus as well others was paved with flat stones. It went on still to the back porch of S. Cælestinus, towards the plain field of Flora: and so forward to the temple some time of Juno, now S. Angelo, and from thence to S. George's church in Valerian. In the pontifical hot-yards there be many antiquities found brought thither from other places: and namely, the prostrarea and counteret of Ilius, also of all forts of eunuchos living and encreasing there. Likewise of Tyber, with the yielding her tests to be sucked of the founders of Rome Apollo with his bow and arrows; the statue of Loue, wherein hath been spoken before, Cæsari hard by Venus. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those hot-yards.

The water Sabatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabatine pool, called Angustilia: and afterwards when the conduit and conveyance thereof was by Hadrian restored, it was brought into the palace of S. Peter, to serve the priests there.

In Vaticane plains, not far from the mount reared by Hadrian, there flood a Pyramis or fleeces in times past, under which they lay P. Secundus Africanus lay entered.

CHAP. XII.
The mount of Hadrianus, and the mepitops called Quintia.

Elius Hadrianus reared a huge and mighty mount for his own sepulchre near the bridge Elius, overagains the Manoleum of Anguis. In which were bestowed both his own ashes, and afterwards the relics of all the Ancestors. This is at this day the fort of the Pope. The same also is called the tower of Crefoeemins, beseate one Crefoeemins, a furious captain, held it a long time, See more inProcopius.
CHAP. XIII.

Of those things which either have been, or remain now without the gate Flaminiana.

The first thing presented to our sight when we are out of the gate Flaminiana is the port-Way or cauley Flaminia: which, as we have before shewed, was by Ca Flaminius brought along as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flint or peble: without he laid it with gravel. And in that order b: all the port-waies laid about Rome. Upon this way Augustus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain scarcely any tokens. Neer unto the cauley Caesar had a farm or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name is, they were hens. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Hospitalls of Ovid. To owe Amylia, made and paved by Licinius the colleague of Flaminia, leadeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now two cauleys there were of that name, the one which met with Flaminia the other which Seamin laid and made, which went through Pisa and Lomn to the Sabini. In like manner there was a way called Tyberina and Casia, without the gate now called Prirdaria, which pulled along time by Su'trium, Terrella and Viterblino into the way Vulturnis. Certain places there be in the way Flaminia some what hallow and flat like fiddles, called therefore Costella. Without the gate Collatina there is a cauley of the same name;

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things that are reported to have been without the gate Collatina.

The port-way from the gate Collatina is called Salarum, because the Sabines at it brought salt into the City. There upon stood the bridge Salarum. And it reacheth to Nomentana. In it was the temple of Venus Erycina, vowed by Fabius the Dictator, and dedicated by L. Pertius. There stood the image of Venus Vercordiosa, so called for that the averted mens minds from wanton lust. Likewise the temple of Honor, and an altar in it. Finally, the monument or tomb of Lucinus the barber of Augustus.

CHAP. XV.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Nomentana and Intragnaes.

Without the gate Nomentana, there beginneth a cauley of the same name, by which men goe to Nomentana. The same is called Egulsina, of the potters furnaces there standing. The goddesse Nana, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with dolefull plaints and lamentable moises, is reported to have had a temple without this gate. In like manner, other gods and goddeses, which are supposed to hurt mankind, they erected temples, but without the gate, because they should do the least harm: and namely, to the Frater, to Marian the revenger, to Nemesis and such other. Upon this way Nomentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about S. Agnes church, and over the same fandeth the bridge Nomentana, built by one Naletes an Eunuch. Between this way and Salarum, was a withdrawing house in the countrye of [Phanous] Nerus freedman, in which Ner was killed himself. Without the gate Intragnæes, was a tower or calls, called Caesar story, where the forrester of Diocletian kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Vitarum, (now Vivarum) to be seen, where divers wild beasts were kept, more for pleasure and delight, then profit and use.

CHAP. XVI.

Of those things that without the gates Equequina, Nerva, Calimentana, and Gabinæ, either have been or now are.

From the gate Tiburtina, there goeth a way of the same name leading to the City Tyber. Upon it there is a bridg Mamaio, commonly called Mamulo and bearing the name of Mamaio Alexander the Emperours mother, who reposed it. A place there is by it called Ponteola, of a multitude of pits there. Also the bridg Lucatina, without the said gate fandeth over the river Anio. And without the same gate the two rivers called Anio the old and new do gather a current and run to Rome. Without the gate Egulsina are waies Labicana and Fratigina. In this way the water Apia hath his head and beginning, which by Appius Claudius was brought into the City. The water Trego likewise, which in time past was Hewed by a maid to the loudiers, is the way, and from thence is conveyed to the City. But the Roman waters see Fratigina, who描述erith rightly excellently, the source and beginning the convience and carriage, the end and use of every one of them. At the end of the way Calimentana, beginneth another called Campana, which cloeth with Latina, the Between the gate Calimentana and Latina, fandeth the gate Gabinæ. From which there
The gate Latina gave both name and beginning to the cauful Latina, which through Levicia, now called Val-monvine, and Latiuin reached to Campainia. In which there stood in old time, the temple of Pompuree, and the image of the god Medea. Of which writeth Paterinius Mure. To the said the water Turna gathereth to an head and current. From the gate Appia, beginneth a cauful of that name, named by Ap. Claudius as far as to Campa, whereof look in Strabo.

At the gate Campa, was the temple of Mars, the warrior, or Grandium; and therein the feau of Mars. Hard by the same temple the round Manulis brought into the City of Rome in an account, and presently there arose a shower of rain; whereupon he was called Manulis. In the way Capena, stood the oratory or chappell of Des boni; and next to it, they say, that Clodius and Naperini were slain. Neat to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollo, the sacred grove of Honour, and the temples of Hecub and Minerva. Likewise of Tempel, built by Museella. Moreover, another of Ridotum: because Annibal having there encamped, was departed to depart from hence mocked and scorned. Upon the way Appia was the bridge Valentia, built by the Emperor Faram, and thereupon, near the hill Messica, stondeth the town Siniflilla.

This way had certain notable sepulchres, namely of Collatius, the Serviens, the Servillii, Tullus, of Emnis, Pompeius, the Horatii, and other. And in that part is to be seen the plain, whereupon the Horatii thought that famous combat to the utterance. In it also there is a water and wellspring, consecrated to Merucer. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurel, and therewith beprinkled them that were not, with an invitation to Merucer; that as many as bad this aleration and sprinkling might be afficled of their finnes, and of perjurie especially. The grove alio of Egeria was this gate. The way Laurentina fell into Appia: wherein S. Sebastis (by report) suffered even in the very place where they used to loom the feaft Terminalis, to the gods of Meers and Bounds.

To the Reader.

For as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of variety: and howsoever otherwise willing enough to force our language, yet most loth to forbear and forget certain Roman words, whereby so long time he had been acquainted also for that now and then he saith one in his English tongue and in his French and Italian another; whereby he may be thought either to trip or to have forgotten himself, and the fault imputed to his teacher in these regards (as we thought) I owed this much for their sake and courtesie with English Livy, as to satisfy them in that behalf. A swallof in fact, therfore I have digested: the one dwelling and leading readily to the most material and principal matters contained in the whole body of the History: the other expounding those things that may seem as first strange to the most: and with all, having here and there the reason of the same difference, hoping that as he will make them more familiar in these strange passages, so the reader in his prime shall excuse and acquit me of such blame, who have endeavored that he might deliver his mind in English, if not so eloquently by many degrees, yet as truly, as in Latin.

Scodra,
A Second Index.

Containing the exposition of those terms in Livy which are not yet familiar in English, and of some places omitted in the Marginal notes.

Whereunto the Reader may have recourse, when he meeteth with any such difficulty in the History.

Aulus, the surname to divers families in Rome.

Aedit, certain inferior magistrates in Rome: who were of two sorts, Plebesi and Curules. Plebesi of the Commons only, two in number, more ancient: then the other, chosen by the people alone to second and to assist the Tribunes of the Commons in their right hands. This name they took of the charge they bad of temples, chappells, and oratories; altho' they registered the SAN:

Sions and acts of the people called Plebesi and kept the same in their own custody; and were clarks of the market; also they exhibited the games and plays called Plebesi. Curules were likewise elected, out of the order and degree of the Patric(i) called of the ivory chair wherein they were allowed to sit as officers of greater state. They set forth the great solemnities called Ludi magni, or Roman; were overseers of the buildings throughout the City as well publick as private, in manner of the equesti in Athens: they had regard to the Publick vaults, links, conveniences, and conduits of the City waters; looked to the Arsenals. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons; and were charged to see unto the provision of corn and victuals. At the first, none but Patric(i) might be advanced to this place: but in process of time, Commoners also attained thereto. These as well as the Plebes were Sacra familia, inviolable.

Eurynius, they were, who being citizens of Rome, were by the Censors deprived of giving their voices in their Century or Tribe; paid all tribute with citizens according to the valuation of their goods; and served in the wars of their own charges: and either because are pendebant, or, aram non merchant, it leemeth they took that name.

Agmen quadratum: Agmine quadrato duxereis is taken in a three-fold sense. First, The same that uelabo exercitu: i.e. agmine; or, in fluend is: which signifieth the ordinary manner of enemies marching with banners displayed, either to a battle, or to the siege and assault of a fortress: and this manner of phrase addeth a grace only to the sentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a four-square battalio, though not always with equal sides & right angles: and the name not charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, When an army is spread and displayed at large, enclosing the impediments or baggage in the midst, for safety and security.

Agges, were laws preferred by the Tribunes of the Commons, as well for division of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons, as to restrain the possessions of the Nobles within a certain limit and compass.

Ambulans, the inordinat and excessive desire to be in office of state, appearing by indirect means; either to their friends and kinsfolks, or to the people: against which, many laws in Rome were provided: namely, Acilia, Babia, Amphilus, Lucida, and others.

Anicia, Anicia was a bucker of sweetmeats, that (as they say) fell from heaven into the hands of K. Numa in time of a plague: and he being advetised by Egerius, that it was for the health of the City, and ought to be kept safe; caused it more to be made unto it, so like, as they could not be known from the pattern: which hereby was preferred. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve Sibyls.

Annales, were brief memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries, containing the names of consuls every year, the date of times, and all memorable occurrences happening therein. The high Priests, called Pontifices Maximini had the charge by their place to gather the same into tables; and to set them up in their houses for to be seen: and hereupon they were called Annales maximini, c Maximini Pontificibus and not of their greatness, as those huge volumes, named Libri Ephemerini.

App. Appius, a forename appropriate to the House of the Claudii in Rome.

Appius, a notable street or high-way, begun by Ap. Claudius, reaching from Rome, as far as Capua: and afterwards by Julius Caesar and Trajan, it was extended to Brindisi in Calabria. Of all other it seemeth to be the principal, by the testimonies of Papinianus the Poet, who writeth thus of it:

Appia condita ferebat Reginae vivi virum.

Called it was Triumphalis (as also the gate Capena:) because through it the triumphs ordinarily passed at the said gate.

Arax maximus, The great altar reared by Horace, leis, and took the name of a great heap of stones about it.

Arbor infelix, is commonly taken for a tree that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argillus, is, the bale or low part of a street in Rome, n regard of the upper end thereof, called Summum in like for as jamus summus & imus.

Area, is taken for some void place, whereupon nothing growth, area: et alia: Forum Romanum in Rome: Area quae pote de bove homen habens, and differeth from Campus, for that it is llei. Alter a plot of ground made level, and clean for to build upon: as in Sallustius 26. Forum Caesaris manibus inserviit, the Area wherof, (id est, the trimming and levelling of the plot) (colt) H-S. miles, in 100 millions of Setterii. Laft of all, the broad yards before temples, not covered but compacted about with columns; like a cloister, with an altar in the mids, be called Area.

Auriciae, were wisards or thouf-fayers, directed by the bowels and inward of beasts killed for sacrifice, called also Extifia, and in Greek (προποροντι), who prying into them was especial regard of the liver; whereupon their whole Art and learning was termed (προποροντι), albeit they observed also the heart, lungs, spleen, and kidneys.

Arc aner, usually in Latin is taken for a Roman poile, or coin in brafs, the tenth part in value of their silver Denarius. At firft it was a pound weight of twelve ounces: but afterwards, the Sextans, d' off, the six-part thereof, was valued worth the whole: and bowe- ver otherwise it altered in poile, it went always for 3 farthings or thereabout of our English money.

Angraevum, See Aupsia.

Aurei Romani, Peaces of gold coin current in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our spur-tolar of 15 sh. For 100 Seterii made aurum, which amount to 15 sh. 7 d. ob. the 4 part of mina, i. e. 1d. in silver, and of an ounce of angel gold.

Aupsia. Aupsiae were properly the observation of the birds, either by their singing and flying in the air; or by their gete, and manner of feeding in their caves: or coup; whereby their Angers & Pollari knew in their learning, the pleasure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterprises or no. The birds that gave sign by their voice and flying, they called Ofiines guais or canentes, as the crow, raven, and owland thereof came Angraevum, guais avium carinatis. Those that flewed ought by their flight & wings, were named Aletes or Pupat, as the buzzard, eagle, crane, gype, sian, and broad-winged fouls, tyrhspark. The good signs were called Sinifra aupsia guais insignia, quod fitan fori, whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chicks kept in cages, they observed whether they came forth willingly to their meat (for to abstain from it was thought unlucky) whereas their feeding heartily, was a good sign, and called solstium tripodium, guais terrapium & terrapodium, when some of the meat felleth out of the mouth, & serrum poeseis, beateth upon the ground; as it mus needs doe, when they pecked either corn, or gobbets called off.

Auris, were certain wars-like engines for to bend out and level mighty stones, to batter and shake City walls, made with ropes and news and womans hair especially twined together; as appeareth by Veneris Caloca at Rome, unto whom, by occasion that the women of the City parted with their hair for that purpose, a Temple was dedicated. According to the weight of stones or ballses that this engin would carry, they were called Centenaria, or Talentaria balsse.

Auris, were lately edifices or halls at Rome: at first serving to plead in under covert, where they differed from Fora: and also to mini- fer justice, of fasaces, which signifieth a Judge, as well as a King: but afterwards they used to meet there in consultation; also to negotiate and trafficke: and there had not only benches and bars like law-courts, but shops also for the better fort of wares and merchandise.

Bellona. The goddess of war; whose temple stood before the gate Cæmeraltui, and near adjoining thereunto was a column named Beltas: from which the Romans were wont to lance a dart or javelin towards those parts where they intended to make war; whereas in former times they lent their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to perform that ceremony.

Bignis, were the Roman Denarius, having the tamp of a chariot drawn with two horses, called Bignis.

Bustarca. The chief magistrates of the Buc- tians.

Cæsarius. The forenamer of sundry fa-

Caeceus, s miles in Rome.

Calends, was among the Romans, the day of the new Moon, which fell out with them ordinarily the frist of every month: fo named of se, sum, se, 1000 miles, a calendae, because the petty Pontify used then to call the people to the court Calebra, and there to pronounce unto them how many daies were to the Nones of each month, &c.

Candidatei, were they that flood in election and sued for dignities of magistracy: during which time, they wore whitier and brighter gowns than ordinary, that they might be the more easily seen and discerned a far off among others.

Captaghita, as well horse as foot, were they that were armed at al pieces with compleat harness: and such horsmen were named De- fenfores.

Cataphætu, were engines of war to flout arrows or shoots like offensive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not only the instrument it self, but the arrow or whatsoever was was shot out of it: as Turneb, writhe in his 15 Adverbar, cap. 1.

Centurio, Magistrates of State in Rome: whose charge was to value and estimate men's goods, and enrol them accordingly in their several ranges. Also to demise unto certain Farmers, called Publicans, the public profits of the City for a rent, and to put forth the City works unto them, to be undertaken at a price. Likewise to oversee men mannerly, whereby oftentimes they would de prive Senators of their dignity, take from gentlemen their horses of service and their rings; displace Commons out of their own trieb, disable them for giving voices, and make them euerari.

Centuriae, were ranges and degrees of men ac cording to their worth, as they were assized and enrolled by the Centurio.

Centuriae comitia, were those assemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their votes and suffraiges according to their behaviour & wealth by Centuriae, And such were at all times most favourable to the no bles.

Circeset Indi (as one would say) Circe-en-set.
For in the beginning before the great fights and topless (called Cirques) were built; the plot of ground wherein performed the horse-runnings and other matters, was flanked on one side with the river, and en vironed on the other with woods. Vide Turneb, Adverb., lib. 3, cap. 5.

Cirrophorus, A piece of silver coin in Greece and those parts near and joying, less than Drachma mo or Drachmarias: so called of the stall, rep resenting a man carrying a panier or basket with Holy reliques, in Cythedes, mystic-vars, in Barthi orginis, or Cereri invitis. It is to be true, that 7500 of them go to the Enboick talent, which containeth 4000 Demarior, it is just our great shooting: but if Drachmarias have propor ionsum & solidum in toto, and that 4 Demarior are 5 cirrophoros, (as Glaeon collecteth out of Badus) it cometh to our teoton of 6 pence.

Clasius, supposed to be the image of Venus, found by K. Tatius in the great vault or rock conveyed under the city, called Clasius minima.
And for that it was not known what goddes it resembled, he gave it the name of that place, Others say, it is written Clasius, of the old word Clus to fight: for that the Romans and Sabins (ready to strike a battaille) were by means of myrtle branches consecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the said goddes was by that name worship ed.

Componialis fexus, Paulus Manius, upon the familiar Epitaphs of Cicero giveth this attribu te to Scipio in the end of the third book of Livy whereas in all editions it is, Compon ialis. Now the fex Componialis, fexes (fitch he) were tho old men, in whole nation and authority, men by their last will and re framents left their widows or daughters: and without whom they might not pass in De militium viatorum per cessionem, be mar ried according to the ceremony called Co emption, whereby the husband and wife seemed to buy one another.

Cohors, was ordinarily a band of 500 soldiery:
although once or twice in Livy we read of Quadragena-cohortes.

Comitium, was a public place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people used to assemble for audience of justice, pleading of causes, and other occasions: whereupon Comitia dies, were such days upon the which they might to assemble and meet to tgether.

Comitia, or Comices, were the solemn assemblies of the people at Rome, summoned by the ma gistrates lawfully; to choose officers, to enact new laws or cancel old, by their voices where there were three forts.

Curia, instituted by Romulus, Centuriae, by S.
Tullius, Tribuna, brought in by the Tribuns of the people: and the first author thereof was P. Velius.

Curiae and Centuriae, were Ambitians, per formed with the solemnity of observing the approbation of the birds, and the Senators, Tribuna, were held by the Commons only, pese que non erant ambientes, and required neither Ambitians nor autoritatem, the allowance of the Praetors. And as in Comitia Centuriae, the richer and greater men had the advantage in Curiae and Tribuna, the poorer fort (for the number) went away with the better.

In the Curiae comitia at the first (until S. Tulli us his reign) palled the election of the consuls, De Cemvirs, Tribuns conulur, Centors, Praetors, and such greater magistrates: and confirmed they were by Curiam. Also, judgment of ca pitall matters, & the laws named Centuriae.
In this there was one centurie drawn forth by lot one out of all the rett to give their voices first and that was called Prae-ordination. After which were recalled to their suffraiges, the Cen turies of the first and second Classis, and they were named Primo-vocata: the rett which followed, were called Secund-vocata.

Tribuna, served for the creation of Tribuns, Ed diles of the Commons and other interior magistrates. Also the laws as touching peace, or enfranchising slaves, judgments penal and fines, and those ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plebeiscite.
Some have thought amils, and Centuri and Tri buna comitia, were both ones; but Curiae were more ancient, and of greater rate as being Anfipican, and ex authority Parum.

Herein only they agreed together and diffr ed from the Conftitutums, that in delivering their voices, the Tribes and Curiae were intermingled: whereas the Centuries were separated and gave their voice according to their degree, age, and ability in the Centurio's book.

Congius, or Clums. A measure among the Romans containing 6 Sextarii, and every Sextarius about 30 ounces: so that Coclius received X. librales mensuras: as appeareth from the old pottuarias thereof in brasis, with these two characters, X.P.t. ten pound. Whereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gallon of somewhat better. And for that great persons were wont at first to give dolo unto the common people, of wine or oil by the Congi; all other donatives and largesses of that kind, were afterwards called Confraria.

Conf, one of the sovereign yeerly magistrates in Rome, succeeding in the place of the Fao, so named, a Confratorium either of asking counsel of the people and Senate in State matters, and withal giving his own advice and providing for the good of the real publick: or else of judging, for so Confidere lignifieth: as when we say, boni confultur. And Livy faith, that Proteres, Confules, and Judges, may be taken one for another. Two of them were usually chosen every year, as appeareth by the law Tables. Regio imperio duos fato: i.eque praenanda, Judicandro Confridendo, Proteribus fultu, judiciis, Confulest appetulator. &c.,

Corona, hath divers significations in Latin, Corona being cingere, to invest a City round about with armed men; and to give the audio from all parts at once, Sub corona vendere servos, to sell slaves in open market, either having garlands on their heads as the manner was, or environed about with a guard of soldiers, which also is called Coroa militus. Sundy garlands or chaplets there were moreover, called Corona, wherewith soldiers were rewarded by their captains, or the honored by their soldiers (besides those that were presented to Generals by their friends and well-willers: or offered to the honour of the gods:) as Ob. donatia or Coronation, which was a wreath of a cincngris called Coronam, given to him that delivered an army from fireight feeges, and was by the whole army bellowed upon that favor, Co=ret, made of oak branches, for him that in battle saved the life of his fellow citizen. Muralie resembled the battlements of walls; which he received of his captain, that first killed the walls and mounted over in the affault of cities. Cauffenfas, in form of a palisade or rampart made with pales or strong flakes; the honor of him who first entred the enemies camp, Naturalis or Rostrum, pourtraift with the ftrong, or beak heads of ships, called Rostrum, this reward that first boored the enemies ship, and gave the first means of a naval victory: These were the principal. For others there were not so ordinary: as namely, Exploratorius garnifhed and let out with the fin, moon, and other flars, belonning upon them that did special service in especial and discovery of the enemies quarters.

Curia, were parishes in Rome, 30 in number instituted by Romulis. Certain halls besides, appointed for assemblies and convocations about Church matters and Religion, whereof some were old, called simply Vetos: others new, named Nova. As for Curia Pftitia, it was an ordinary ancient place of publick counsel within Rome.

Curia, the Priest belonging to each Curia or parfifith aforesaid: and Curio Max. the chief in-perintendent over them all.

Decius, a forename: for Decius, although it was the gentle name of a house, grew afterwards to be a forename, as Paulus and likewise forenames at the first, came to names families, as Polybinius.

D. Decimus, a forename likewise, as of that Brin tus surnamed Albinius, who killed e.g.

Decurors, were magistrates, officers, or fellowships. ten in number.

Decurors legitimus servandus, were ten men chosen to make laws in Rome; who afterwards usurped the sovereign authority, and tyrannized.

Decurors马克rum, were certain Priefis, who had the keeping and peruing of Sibylius books of delitines, and thereout gave order for farities and expanion of prodigies.

Decurors: ten Judges or minifters of Justice, elected out of the great congre or couneil of the 100 Centumvirs, and they were called, Decurors de litibus judicandis: alfo they were to the Pretor or Lachic judge.

Dilutor, a foreman magistrat above all others in Rome, from whom no appeal was granted, mere absolute and King-like: but that his time of rule was limited within six months ordinarily: fo named, either because he only said the word and it was done, or because he was Dilatus, i.e. nominated only by one of the Confuls, and not otherwise chosen, usually in some time of great danger of the state. He was called also Pretor Maximus: and namely, when he was made for the ceremony of striking up or driving a nay: alfo Magifter Populi, as Cicero 5 de fin. Moreover, he was sometimes appointed to ordain and hold solemn feaits, in regard that it had rained Stone.

Dunurors, magistrats two in number, of divers sorts.

Dunurors capitales, judges to sit upon life and death: from whom it was lawful to appeal to the people.

Dunurors sacrarium, out of the Patririans, ordained for dedication of temple, preparing the sacred beds for the gods, called Leiifterius: and for the books of Sibylla: these afterwards were increated to five, and to to ten. See Decurors.

Dunurors
The Second Index.

Dumnavi Naves, two wardens of the navy, ports, and sea-coasts.

Epulones, were certain Priests whose office was to prepare and set out the solemn feast for Jupiter called Epulion, and for other gods. Of them there were three, called Trimviri Epulones, and after seven, Septemviri Epulones.

F

Feciales were the Heralds: of whom there was a college of 20, the principal of them was Paterpartum, as it were their Dean. And according to Plutarch, he ought to be a man that had children of his own, and his father living: for having the charge of making peace and alliances, it behoved that he should be a person accomplished, and as well to look before as behind, not to weigh all to come: the one was signified by his father, the other by his children.

Fasti signified sometimes fasti dies; holidays: and in that sense Ovid entitulath his books Fastes, wherein he feteth down the ordinary feasts of every month. Otherwhiles they are put for law-dais, wherein the L. chief justice or Pretor might use these three words, Do, Dico, Addico, which betoken to give leave to the party for to plead, to miniter law and justice between plaintiff and defendant, and to pronounce the sentence and award.

Flamines, certain Priests among the Romans: they took that for name of Flamen, a file of woolen yarn, that they used to wear upon their heads. Three of them there were Pater, and thole were called Magnes, namely, Dialis, for the service of Jupiter, 2 Maristas, of Mars; 3 Quinctiales, of Romulus deified. Of Commoners were 12 more, called Minoris, deputed to inferior charges, and the meanest of them all attended the service of Pomona, the goddess of apples and such fruits.

Fortuna, a great goddess in Rome, entituled with many and sundry names.

Fortuna, a goddess of Rome, whose temple was in Transpontina region, where the she was honored and worshiped of idle persons, such as prostituted nothing, but lived of their rents only, and namely, for that the same unlooked for and unregarded.

Forte Fortuna, a strong fortune, so called for her power especially in battle. Publicly, when she favored the common-wealth, Moxelis, good to the male kind, and Mutethis, to the female, Virile, kind to folk of ripe years. Primi geniia, gracious to the first begotten or the eldest, Epulonia, either for running to help with great speed or aulant in horde-service. Obsequenstibus and easily instituted to accomplish all their vows and desires. Pervia, for advancing mean and obscure persons to wealth and worship. Seia, for the kind and leavenable ripening of corn and fruit. Prorsa, which was alwais present and vouchsafed her helping hand. Medea, when contrary-wife she was backward and evermore crost her designs. Vesta, for that many a one hath been by her enticements fared and entangled. Redona, Julius, Bene Spurerus, Re fugiatis, Propertis; Virgo, Calixtus, Converta, graci to Anivos, and, digna altissim, cæsa Vetrici, &c. See Alexander ab Alexandri, Mundanum.

Forum Romanum, or Lucreius, the great common place at Rome, wherein cauies were pleaded, and audience given to publick Orations. Under the name of Forum were other places also, and courts, as also markets, distinguished by their proper adjuncts, as Forum Boarium, Olturium, &c.

Frees, Whereof slaves were called Esclavus, was a kind of fork or gibbet which slaves carried upon their shoulders when they were scourged by their misters, either about the Forum or Circue: whereupon afterwards they were crucified and executed: howe'er, some think they bare it only for a publick shame.

G

Gabinus ejusmodi was a kind of habit and wearing of a gown after the Gabinus fashion, when it was call over the shoulder to backward, that it seemed to compass and gird round the whole body. In that manner the Consul clad, used solemnly to set open the dores of Iupiter Temple, before he went to the wars.

Genius, Genii were supposed to be mercators and paravirs, brokers (as it were) between men & the gods; or rather interpreters and Salsus, messengers between, of a middle nature between the one and the other, Calvis Rhodian, lib. 2, chap. 3. But according to Empedocles, each one was thought to have a spirit from the very day of nativity, unto whom they used to sacrifice upon their birth day, as to their protector. Also every place had their peculiar Genii, and then were they called Latas, as Rudeles, and paraviris in Ligii.

Galli, Priests of Cybele that gualded themselves in a frantike fry, and used in their service to her, for to strike and beat upon tabers and drums.

H

Aba, Besides the ordinary signification, signified the Centumvir or Decemviral juridiction in supply or assistance of the Praetor, for that they set up a spear to be seen at the place of judgement. Also it be toketh port-fale, when they sold either goods or slaves to him that would bid most at such a speare. Moreover, the putting forth of the Cities works, called "Burterius", to certain Publicans or undertakers by the great, at a price, and it was called Publius flatio.

Aeneas is a God in Rome, sometime represented By Moses with two faces, signifying the time passed, and that to come otherwhiles Quadrifrons, & betokeneth the four times of the year having in his right hand a character resembling 300, in the left another, shewing thereby and five, according to the dates of the year. But in the plural number Bona, betoken certain halls or great four-square buildings, with four prospectts and cross thorough-fires, whereof were divers in Rome.

Index. Eight days in every month of an old word Iuda, to divide: for that commonly fall about the midst of the month, namely, upon the thirteenth or fourteenth days, according to Homer, Hymn 53. aed. August., found in

Interruption of water and fire, were they who for some crime were banished Which judgement, although it was not by express sentence pronounced, yet by giving order, that no man should receive such an one into his house, but deny him fire and water (the two necessary elements of life) he was condemned (as it were) a civil death: and this was called Legitim exilium. But voluntary exile was when a man to avoid the payment of a grievous fine, or imprisonment, went out of the way of his own accord, and left his own country.

Ingerrum, which commonly-intreand Acre-see-ment among the Romans, to be in measure of land the Baisy ground, and foundation of all other measures in that kind: like as, the Asis or Aulis, of weights: of which it bor-roweth the terms in sub-division and multiplication, whereof the least is Semi-jerseps. Now is the Sampulos in land measure fifteen foot square, according to which, it may beon be gathered, how much Ingerum containeth; considering it hath that name, a duovis altius lycintis: by which reckoning it betreeth 2880 foot of ground within the square. But for that, others think that Ingerum is much as un nons homo non die executavit, one dayes work of a yoke or team of oxen; for want of another fitter word (except I would call it a journal) I have expressed it by our familiar term of an acre, which is not much under or over a dayes work in plowing of oxen here in England.

Interruption, or Interrugy, is properly the time between the former King deceased, and the creation of a new: and he that ruled in the mean space, was called Interrugy. Which terms continued afterwards in the free state when there were no Kings, in the case of vacancy of head-magistrates.

II. This Character compounded of two capital H, and the letter S, thus coupled together, is Seftirium, that is to say, a silver coin among the Romans, consisting of two Ales and an half, and therupon it hath the name Seftirium, as a man would say, demis tertius, two, and half the third: and therefore you see the numeral note of two, and 5, for semiis, which is half. It is the fourth part of the Roman Denarius; and in value among us is three half pence farthing one. But Seftirium in the neuter gender, betokeneth a man as null Seftirius, i. a thousand Seftiries, that is Seftirium five times ten thousand Seftiries, and Seftirium is as much for you must in this matter of speech understand miles for the regimen of the Cenithecias.

But if you add unto Seftirium the numeral adverb, it sheweth the same Seftirium in the new above said: multiplied a hundred times so much as the said numeral beareth. For example, deces Seftirius, is deces Seftirium, a hundred times toid and as much to say as deces occres a millia Seftirium, which is a million of Seftiries in the primitive signification: whereby a man may loon reckon how much is null Seftirium and the rest, either under or over deces. The same is to be paid of Nummus and Nummus, for it is the same that Seftirium and Seftirium. Moreover, deces, miles, and such like adverbs, whether you put Nummus or Seftirium thereto, or no, is all one: so that by this form of speaking, qui bonum virot tici, is meant thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Seftirie pieces. Thus much for Latin and other Historians and writers in prose: for I am not ignorant that Poets for the verisake confound these two words many times, and put Seftirium for Seftiria, as Georgius Agri-cola hath well observed.

Leper Indiges, Indiges were ofte calle, and quid multum vel indigem, because they need not things, nor quod in deus agentes, converting among the Gods, having been sometimes men: or by reason that they might not indigem, i. be named; or rather for that they were easy to be embraced, and left of all, qua si in leon dement & idice propiti i, the tutelary gods and protectors of this or that place: which I rather encline unto.

Institutum, was the way of civil jurisdiction and pleas for the time, upon some Tribunal troubles, as Turbell Gaiiscus. &c. Which vacation if we will be somewhat bold, may be called not unjustly a Law-seeed, as Solfistium the Sun-seeed.

K, Kain. The forename of many Ro mens.

L, Lucius. The forename of many Ro mens.

Latina, sc. servi. Certain holy days consecrated, by the Priest or Magistrate, as occasion required, and nocte clavis. The solemnity was published and held by the Roman Consul newly created, upon the mount Al banus to Iwper Latitus: and a sacrifice there there offered which they call Latuar, for the health of the Latine people: at which, the manner was to give a dose of flux called Vestisaria to the Latine States.

Luttorium, is in some for declared in the first and two and twenty books of T. Livius: and is as much to say, as the solemn ceremony of trimming and letting out a bed, neither to pole but repass, according to the ancient manner: wherein they laid the images of their gods, set upon bolsters and pillows; the principal whereof was that in the honour of Jupiter at the Eppulum Jovis, whernpon Jupiter was laid, Juno and Minerva sitting of either side by him.

Lutus is usually to be underfoot in Lity for the bed whereupon they laid themselves at ease when they took their repose and Triplum is taken for Conclave, i.e. the pastor where they were wont to lie, because the usual manner was to set three high beds or pallets together: (whereof the room had the name) and a table raised somewhat higher from the floor, and placed so, as it served all three pallets, and was open at one side for the servants to come unto it, and either let meat thereupon, or to minister what was called for. Upon each of these beds thefeate or leaned ordinarily three persons; so as nine was the full number of guests at the board, according to the rule, No feerer than the graces: nor more than the minifters. For Hot race in this verse, Sapi tribus velit eum a coarent quateront, feemeth to glance at the niggregific of that which rather would want meat than guests, and so let twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby also they were pent up together too togethe.

Lestis are usually taken for Empedors sent from one Prince or State to another. Allo for Lientenants in a army, having the charge of a legion under the General, and in his absence, the charge and command of all. Who likewise were sent as Nuncios or mesengers of credence from the Generals in the field, to make true report unto the Senar, of the success of their affairs. Moreover, they are oftentimes put for deputies-delegates, or commissioners affignant to the Cof. or L. General, in matters of state; having their principal directions from the Senar, but commissio to deal in the particulars after their own discretion: much like to those that are called Legati et a latere.

Liburni, the gods of funerals: and after a fort, the superintendunt over funepes; supposed to be Venus Epromiba. In whole Temple were all things to be sold necessary for the interring and burial of the dead. Whereupon they also who were employed to carry forth and bury corpless, were called Liburni as well as Vestillians in Greek υστιες and Χεσειες. It is put for death in Horace, when he saith, Non omnes mortas, movasque parvae, pustul Liburniam: and in Lity, as well for the ministers as furniture to funepes belonging. The Chappell to this goddes flood without the City, and a gate there was Liburni, at which they carried forth their dead. For at Rome they might not commonly bury or burn a dead corpus within the City, unleas it were upon a special privilege: and the law of 12 tables provided therefor in these expres words, In urbem non feculiu necunm: but in some burren part of their land, each man bestowed the ashes or bodies of their dead. The practice whereof is evident by many examples in histories: and at this day are monuments standing of their tombs teared near the great cancey Apia, and elsewhere about Rome. The considereion hereof, with some other circumstances of a place in the 3. book of Lity gave me occasion haply to translate amis, There hundred to be a great mortallity in Rome and the territoriy about it not only of men but of catel also, at what time as the Volcans and Equirans were encamped within three miles of Rome, with a purpose to give the assault to the City; but they were suddenly traken with a fear that they daut not approach neer, tellanor procul a sita quinomines innum, utercr memora curam, &c. where I have engilshed innumenem suntlib, tombs & graves near at hand, in opposition of sela aur- bi (Romans) procul ens: and the rather, becau'e it precipitously floweth, In deserto agro, inter tenem perorum atque hominum: where tombs may well be put for tombs and monuments, and (monuments) near at hand: as Lity and others do thake those words. But if any man would have it meant rather of the 7 hills of Rome commanding and overlooking those homles shorefull, I will not be against it, but rather my (superior) prophtes shall go with him, and pardon me I hope he will, it either there or elsewhere where I have seemed to nod and take a little nap, Nemius opere in longa satis ob respira forum ini: seeing that I have taken my self in the manner, and not slept until my neighbour awaked me.

Liburni in Lity are minifters or sergeants attending upon the magistrates of Rome: namely, Dictators, Consuls, Pretors: for those only were called somtime magistrates nd sequlas, as superior to the reit: so called (as Fesius thinketh) good ifes vormnum lugurator, for that they carried rods tied up in bundles; which rods were of birch, willow, hazel, or the Carpine-tree, (a kind of Plane or Maple) and within them stuck an axe, all to signify whipping and death. Those officers made way before those magistrates, and were minifters also of the execution.

Pannonial or Pannoniak, was a solemn diet or council, wherein all the states of Eturia assembled to consult of publick affairs.

Patres, were at Rome 200 Senators or Noblemen, councillers of state: chosen in this manner: 3 out of every one of the 30 Curia, and those make 90; 3 more out of each tribe, (which then were but three) and one by Romanibus himself: and as this number made the body of the Nobility or Senate at the first, to out of every Curia, he chose ten of the most performable and a chief yong men, to the number of 300, (which he called Celere) to guard his perthon. From whence came the order of the knights or gentlemen of Rome in a mean degree between the two estates of Nobles and Commons, as it was the seminary, to replenish the Senate, when the places were void, and to augment the number of them. These were called Patres Conscripti, Aedilci, & Seleth. And like as the former were named Patres Majorum gentium into the latter sort, Minorum gentium, alluding to the several ranges of the gods, who were some of them, Majorum gentium, such as ever were counted in heaven termed also Seleth: others, Minorum gentium, who had been men, and were after canonized gods. The offpring and progeny of the Patres, were Patris, in opposition evermore of Plebeii, Commons.

Porticus were either the porches & other fatel building before temples, as belonging unto them: or else goodly galleries and walking places apart by themselves under which men retired in the rain, and where they used to walk to cool themselves insummer.

Praca,
The second Index.

Pridies, booty, pillage, or saccage in the own kind, as it was gotten from the enemy, to wit, slaves, prisoners, beasts goods, armor, &c. Concordiae, the mony raised of such pillage or prey, fold.

Praetor, one of the inferior magistrates of Rome. In the City he ruled as chief justice: in the province he commanded as L. governor and deputy; and was General in the field as well as the Consul. At first, the name of Consul, Praetor, and Judges, was all one.

Praetextata, were those centuries in Consulari Centuria, which by lot had the first place in giving their voices: the rest that followed, were called Praetor-vocati and Prae- vocati, and delivered their suffrages in their course.

Praeventa togae, a robe embroidered of purple, common to men and women. Insigniss, insignes, & ornamentum. Cicero in Verem, 3. Whereby it appeareth, that it was allowed but to certain persons; and as, P. Manius written to, 6 forts.

The children of the Paritia until 17 years age. 1 All Senators upon festival days, 3 Wardens at the games or plays called Compristis. 2 All magistrates, as well as in the City, as in the colonies or borrough Towns in corporate, called Municipia, and Masters of Corporations, 3 All Priests, and among them, the Augusts. 6 They that triumph. And this differed from the rest, being wrought without gold and damask work.

It seemeth that these differed likewise one from the other, in the manner of the guardind clad broader or narrower, as also in the rich or deep colour, wherein they were called Dibaspia, or that some of these robes were all one purple, other but parcel. And whereas the gentlemen of Rome are laid Poor, poor indigere, it is to be understood either of ingeniis clarissimis, or else of some lighter colour, as the violet, and not of that rich red purple, which is scarlet, for that robe which was done upon our Saviour Christs, * one of the Evangelists called Fasciarius, and another two, Pollarus.

Pollarus, the Chickmaster or pulliﬁer: one that had the charge and overseeing of the farked chickens, kept in a pen or coup for Aspleida: who by observing their gellure or feeding betimes every morning, related what was foctokened thereby good or bad. See more in Aspleida.

Quadrans, the name of a coin, of the value of 1/4 of a denarius, of 1/12 of a quadrans, or 1/48 of a sesterce, and 1/240 of a denarius. Hereof you may read in the oration of Cicero, pro lege Mutila. Howbeit in my translation of Livy, I have sometime used Viz-pretor and Viz-consul, for Pro-pretor and Pro-consul: because that manner of composition frameth well with our terms in English.

There were the Demiur Romani, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with four horses, called Quadriga.

Quadrum, a piece of bale brass coin or poitae at Rome, the fourth part of As, which is a cue and a c.

Quaestors were inferior officers in Rome, as treasurers to receive and lay out the City-money, whereof there were Urban, Provinicial, and Cursorens.

Quaestorium, a plot or quarter in the Roman camp, where the treasurer lodged and other officers of the camp.

Quintus, the forename of sundry Romans.

Quinctenarius, the name that Denarius first, and Decimarius, sicarius faciundis. Their number was 15, and although they were no called by Syllas Dictator to 60, yet they retained till the name of Quinctenarius.

Quintus was a gate in the Roman camp, at which provision was brought in to serve the market. Read the annotation in the end of English Tacius.

Quintenarius Menenarii, were certain men, five in number, appointed upon occasion to discharge the debts of the commons, of called Mennas, a table set out in publick place; upon which they either cound or weighed their money.

Quintenarius resicendis, were five ofﬁcers at Rome chosen extraordinary for repairing of the walls and turrets of the City.

Quinquecens or Quinquatrus, were certain feasts and games at Rome, in the honor of M. Censor. They continued five days, and began the 26 day of March, and these were called Quinquatrus Majoris. For others named Minores, about the Ides of Jun, and that was the minstrels holiday, as appeareth in the ninth of Livy.

Quintilia, the month of July, before Julius Caesar.

Quirinius, was a festival day to Quirinia, appointed for them to sacriﬁce, who had neglected or misted to do divine service in their parish at the feast Forensis; and it was called the fools holiday; for that they were ignorant of the time of the former feast, or knew not their own Curia.

Quirites, the name appropriate to the citizens of Rome: and to they loved to be called within the City: but in the camp, if the General gave them that term, it was taken for a great digracy unto fools and men of arms.
Oractii, were light armed footmen, resembling our f of tarm hope; so called \textit{rerei}.

Dew. For like as there sallenth commonly a drizzling dew before a good flour of rain: so these \textit{Korvan} skirmished loolly, before the lega donary fouldiers came to the battrial.

\textit{Roftra}, were three-lined pikes of brazen, set in the nose or back-head of war-ships to offend the enemy, as appeareth by \textit{Virgili}, \textit{Roftris} tridentibus: and thereupon by \textit{Spectaculis}, the staves of ships were so called. And for that the publick pulpit for orations at Rome, was reared and adorned with such, it also was called \textit{Roftra}.

\textit{Rudera}, [\textit{Cum milites religionem tolli rudera iace-rem.}] To make tense of this place, I have translated \textit{Rudera}, pieces of brazen money: for that I cannot see what should be meant by rubbish stone in that place, which was not demolished by \textit{Annibali}, for any thing that I can find but only robbed of the silver & gold within the chapel of \textit{Peron}, in that whereof were found \textit{aer} acruei: by reason that the fouldiers, who had some fience of religion & rouch of confidence (whereof their leader \textit{Annibalis} had never any) call from them \textit{Rudera}.

Now, probability is that \textit{Rudera}, is corruptly put for \textit{aer}, the latter end of the word: or we admit \textit{Rudera}: it is well known that \textit{Rudus} as well as \textit{aer} significeth brazen and brazen mony, as appeareth by \textit{Rudensulentum} the diminutive: for as of \textit{as came \textit{Esciulium}, so of \textit{Rudus} (no doubt) \textit{Rudensulentum}: and like as of \textit{Esciulium}, \textit{Esciulam}, a god of the Painims, father of \textit{Argenteus} (becauie copper & brazen money was before silver coin): so of \textit{Rudensulentum}, the gate \textit{Rudensulentum} in Rome, set out with brazen. Now that \textit{Rudensulentum} is put for a small piece of brazen coin, it is proved by the form of words in buying and selling, and in manumission (\textit{Rudensulentum servum}) which is all one with \textit{aer} \textit{brason} \textit{servum} or \textit{aer}. By which I collect that \textit{Rudera} in this place may stand for \textit{aer}, pieces of coin. For there went afore, \textit{aer} acruei, which \textit{Herod} putte for heaps of brazen money, and not for brazen images.

And well it may be, that the fouldiers upon some devotion, throwed into the Church their oblations of such mony as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & construction of mine may serve, until some what may be made of rubbish stone, or better exposition come in place. The word \textit{Rudera} is true will bear it, and the context in all fence and congruity, doth require it.

as such Senators were called Curules (for the rest, who had not attained to those dignities, they named Pedanes, as some think; for that they went on foot to the Senate or places before mentioned) so those magistrates likewise above-said, were entitled by the name of Curule. And Curules was that chair called either, of Curius a charioteer, for that they set thereupon within their chariots; or, quæbus Curux, because it was made crooked or curb-wise, like unto our folding chairs.

Senatur, A Counsellor of State, A name was of honor, and not of age, as the word implied: for to that place men attained often times very young, Senat was the body of that degree and common Council, opposite unto Plebs at Rome, namely, when it was erected and the whole people comprehended under Senaturs ordo and Plebein.

Sextarius, a small bradn piece of mony at Rome, which being the first part of Aœs, commeth to one half a lating.

Sextarius was the Basis of measures in Rome, as of weights: and look how As was divided into twelve ounces, so Sextarius into twelve cynthis, and in measures Sextarius was the sixth part of Sextarius, which weighed twenty ounces, much about a wine pint and a half among us.

Of Sibylla books so often mentioned in Livy, which being three in number, were bought of Sibylla by King Tarquin the proud; at the price of nine, after the had burned fix of them before his face; which books were kept diligently in the Capitol: and whereto the Decemvirs by their learning made report of the will and pleasure of the gods, see A.Gellius, 1 book 19 chapter.

Sigillum was the general name of all the ensigns in the field, but Agula more particularly was the main standard to a whole legion: so called, for that upon the top of a spear was reared and fastned an Eagle in silver at full relief, and the same sometime was gilded standing upon a base or foot of the same metal. The other ensigns, as well of cohorts, which were bands of five hundred men usually, as of centuries, companies of hundred's, named more especially Peculis and were generally called Sigillum, had the porcupine of Minotaur, wolves, boars, horses, dragons, with sundry other devices according to the fancy of the Colonels or captains, containing also the name of the cohort or Century, and the legion to which they belonged.

Aenetus Atticus, As well ponderale which was weighed, as numerale or nummariwm, which was counted in mony, was of two sorts: The les of sixty pound Attick, and every one of them consisted of a hundred Drachmae or Denarii Romani, if Minas then be three pound two thilings six pence, sterling, the les talent Attick amounteth to 287 pound ten thilings of our English mony. The great-ter, or simply the great, talent, in Livy, is fourscore mina, and hath proportionem belli-

T. Timae, A forename to many houses of the Romans.

Testudo, A target-lence, which the legiiffany, made either in the open field when they were overcharged with their enemies, or in approaching the walls of Towns to give assalt. In the former, after they had enclosed within them their baggage and light armed men, they retired themselves upon their knees, with their targets close couched together over their heads, to avoid the enemies shot: and after they had well breathed they would rise up at once again, heath and fully to a new skirmish. In the latter, they had the like target-roof, but pent-house wise, one overlapped the other after the manner of tiles, and so they scaled walls without offence from above.

Templum hath in Livy three significations, 1. A sacred house or chapel dedicated to some god or goddes for divine service: as the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. 2. An open place, from whence a man might see all about him, as having nothing to hinder his prospect, and which likewise might be seen from all parts, whereof is cometh the word Contemplaria, i. e. to behold. And such did the Augurs chafe for to take their signs of bird-flight. 3. Any place hallowed, although not for divine service, yet for debating of serious human affairs, as their Curia and Council-Chambers, yea, and the Rostra at Rome.

Theodoss, An Augurice or lucky word used at Bridals or weddings in Rome, like to this among the Greeks, "νερόφως, νερόφως, νερόφως" Hymen. O Hymenat, hymen, Ec. Canad.

Thenes whereof Livy writeth in the fift & ninth books, were certain petty chariots or dreyes of silver or ivory, carrying the images and ornaments of their gods in great pomp upon certain high daies: and they who led the horses drawing the same, wore their richest apparel, holding in their hands and training the falle reins stretched out at length in lenn wise, whereupon Fenix thinketh they took the name Thenes aisis Tena.

Trabea was a roial robe or mantle of cloth, all of deep purple or scarlet only, at the first: but afterwards, embroidered richly with gold. Livy leemeth to confound it with Fenix par- pura, Polia, Palmata et Triumphalis. And in truth, all one they were in the principal substance and matter thereof, namely, purple or scarlet but different in the setting out, being embroidered with gold, more or less: distinguished also with white among (for that was a royal colour) as may appear by the diadem, which was a white wreath, or band done about the head of kings, or in the manner of the work: for either it was palma an do called à lattitude clausuram, i. of the broad buttons of gold, and inferior lamina, to the breadth of ounces, as Fœmin thinketh: or brachiated and damasked with flour-work, like to the date-tree: or else pliing, of tifflew — or embroidery.

Triumphs of the Commons were certain Magistrates, Provosts, or Prentices, of the Commons, to restrain and keep down the excessive power of the nobility: chosen and confirmed by the general oath of the people, whereby they were Sacramentis, sacred or inviolable, and no violence might be done to their person. They had a negative voice, and power of inhibition, called Intercession, whereby they might cross and stop the proceedings of the Senate, or any magistrate, save only the Dictator: even the very Consuls, whom in some case they might command.

Triumphs military in Consuls authority, or Consualy, governed the state of Rome many years in stead of Consuls.

Triumphs military in the army, were Colonels over a thousand.

Triumphs earum, were the keepers of the City chamber or common Treasurer, as it were, the masters of the exchequer.

Triumphs in Rome, first three, containing each of them ten Caria: but afterwards they were five and thirty, containing all the natural citizens of Rome.

Triumphs mottovi, was a kind of ignominy and disgrace, when a man was dispirited by the censors out of his own tribe into another more bale than it, and named ἕτερις ἐν υμναμοις of which urbana there are three, Suburbanum, Eugeniana Palatina and Collina; into which King Servius distributed those that were mammielad, and Ritus afterwards forensis urbam.

Triumphs capitales: Three Judges delegat to sit upon life and death, touching felonious crimes, They were called also Quaestores peregrini. &c.

Triumphs Monetales: Three officers for the mint of mony, either brals, silver, or gold. They are represented in old coins by these five letters stamped thereupon. Α.Α.Α.Π. for άτερος παράλατος φάλλων, for that is to say, for the melting and stamping of brals, silver, and gold. They were afterwards four in number, and named Quaestores.

Triumphs or Tremitori nonnulli, Three overseers of the night-watch, for fire &c.

Triumphs Menestri, Three Commissaries depad for the time, and as occasion required, in stead of bakers or Butchers to receive a flock of mony, and to lay the same out upon extraordinary charges, as in the time of the second Punick war. When the City church was without mony. Which flock was put into their hands out of private men's purses, by way of a voluntary benevolence and contributio, as appeareth in the fifth and twentieth book of Livy.

Triumphs, [Extraordinarii] Three likewise to levy fouldiers and make men ready to bear arms (without the usual order of multiers) throughout Italy, upon some special occasion.

Triumphs coloniae dedicantes, three commissioners who had authority to enrol new inhabitants into any colony: also to set out and divide the City lands gotten by conquest, at their discretion among them.

Triumphs also there were three, Wardens to oversee the sacrifices, the oblations and offerings to the Gods.

Triumphs, certain festal plays instituted (as Fœmin thinketh) by King Tarquinius the proud, for to pacify the internal gods: upon occasion of a contagious malady that happened to women great with child, endangering both them and them, so he went with: which arose upon the corrupt feilte, sold abroad in the market of oxen and bulls, killed for sacrifices: whereupon the money employed about those solemnities, was called Taricum as.

Sacrataurium or Subsacraria, was a solemn sacrifice at the festival, review, or purging of the City every fifth year: and this was called Subsacrariae, or Sacrariae: It was performed by killing a bull, a ram, and a dove, At which solemnity all that were able to bear arms, assembled in order or battle.

Triumph, a solemnity in honor of them who have vanquished their enemies: so called, for that their fouldiers rebated, fio triumphps (as Varro thinketh) or of 354.40.65. for 354.40.65. one of Bacchus names, the first inventor thereof: of these equal three voices: because it was granted by the lustrations of fouldiers, Senators, and common people: as it may appear in Livy, by the triumph of L. Paulus Aemilius, who had like to have been disappointed thereof, by his own fouldiers.

Venus Ercinia. Ovid, 4. F. 36. a sculena notima colla tenet: she is so called of a promonitory in Sicily, called Eryx, where there was a goodly temple built in the honour of Venus: and afterwards at Rome also in memorial thereof.

Veriis Festenamini, certain licentious and unchaste songs used among the Paumans at weddings; the manner whereof, came first from the city Pessennium (as some think) or as others, Quin festum publicum accetre, because they were thought to have venue with witchcraft and forcery.

Vexilla virginum, were certain professed Nunse, to vow virginy, who had the keeping of the sacred fire of Vesta. Necta et deus, quam puram intellecte flamman. Ovid. This Vesta was brought from Troy with the image of Minerva, called Palladium, and other holy relics.

Viro tribunis, i.e. senators, were certain City works, for which the cenfores did bargain with the Publicans or undertakers, at a price.

Venice.
Verba, although it signifieth a special herb, called Verbum, is, in English, and in Greek, spes. Verba, because doves delight much to be above it: yet the word is attributed to divers other herbs put to holy use among the Paintings, which are called Sagittiz in Latine, and in Greek, sagittara. But Dioscorides described one for thereof which runneth by the ground, and groweth not so high as our vervin doth, and it feemeth to be that which the Physicians, Herbarists, and Apothecaries call Gramen, ἐποίησεν in Greek, de chien in French: and the cock graza in English: according to that faith Livy, Fecialis ex arcens purum graminis herba attulit.

Victoriusus, sagittarum nummus. A piece of Roman silver coin, half Denarius, and a double Sestertius, having the image of Victory stampled upon it, either standing on foot crowned with a chaplet of bay, or else carried in a triumphall chariot drawn with four steeds, holding forth in her right hand the foresaid garland, as it is to be seen in divers antiquities of coin.

Veteres signifieth a place in Rome called Vet-ere Curia in respect of Novis, or certain shops called Argentaria of bankers; in regard of others also, named Noves.

Supplement to the Second Decad of Livy's Roman History

In Latin

With the Quellen und Quellenwerk der Geschichte der Hebräer, Ägypten und Assyriens.

To the High and Mighty Princess, and his most Gracious Lady,

CHRISTINA,

By the Grace of God Queen of the Swedes, Goths, Vandals and the adjoyning Provinces.

Madam,

T hath happily fallen out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in so great a Majesty, have given me advantage of omitting one of these two subjects which usually are the Contents of Dedieatory Epistles. For I have so many reasons to declare why I present this Supplement to your Majesty, that if I were forced like wise to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accomplish it without a long and tedious Epistle. But now those Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Necessity, seeing out of your Humanity you condescended to read the Work while it was in Composing, and by your Learning more fully understood, then I or any other could expound what was superfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuse the meanesse of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that is my Design hath no more happily succeeded, (Let those men pretend shortness of time, multitude of business or incommodities of sickness, who aim at other Glory besides that of Obedience) it sufiiceth me, I am conscious, that in writing this, I have observed the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of Livy's History, which at that time you diligently read, I had finished this Work as a Bridge over a broken Passage, You were pleased (according to Your excellent and well known Goodness) to express your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, so to judge them fit of Publick View, that others might likewise be profited by them. Wherein You manifested both your Wisdome and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was solely intended for your own service, you were willing should be useful unto all: Your Wisdome in that, in this new beginning and encrease of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exercise their Wit and Industry in publishing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they shall have understood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpolished Piece of mine. When therefore I fee not only those who are born unto your service, but many also of strange Nations most willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet amongst a few of your most Faithful and nearest subjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majesty? I am indeed His
The Epistle Dedicatory.

who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity; neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majestie, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is, to attend God's will only in those things which are expressly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majestie alone; which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this was a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deforts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to say whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to serve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Case, and on both sides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happily not be relished by your Majestie, who do more freely exercize your Virtues, and select your Favours, then willingly bear them repeated. And if, in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fall in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a desire and good will as I prosecute them) had Liberty to expatiate, I could in no wise according to th. ir Dignity set forth, much less be strengthened within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the businesse (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as both your Majestie; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to bear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if I were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majestie forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness, to perish; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I see what is happened, whilst I beg leave to Write I loose both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to say, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tibereius reproach-eth C. Caesar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues; which may justly be inverted as to Your Majestie, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, infomuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet; however it came to pass, the Swetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their days; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countrie: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is, to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare
The Epistle Dedictory.

The immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discern which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindness of judgment to measure the Greatness of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions; and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glory of this Kingdom, even by Gustavus the Great, and his Daughter Christina. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most accurately and skillfully manage affairs at Home: God having reserved Your self, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, hath every way accomplished You so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessity of War, You could not complain of anything wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. Whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercise, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perplexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Victories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of Your Reign, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hift declare; I shall only name the encreafe of the City, many Towns built and well conftituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amened, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreafed, the Universities enriched, Schools eredt, Merchandize flourishing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the Simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adjoined toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-ways, building of Inns, and indeed to all things which we fee, which we are sensible of, and the benefic which we enjoy, so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shall hereafter rest under your Protection: whom I would have, with my self and all other Your Subjects, think no signifier of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eyes by reason of the misery of times past, or are so binded by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatness of Jo Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler, but like that of the Sun, True, and Purer, and Inmate, neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to deny they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolific in the Commemoration of your benefits below.
The Epistle Dedictory.

beffowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Causes of this Dedication, as likewise not unworthy Monuments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwayes found most manifestly present in this business. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto persuading me), as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer itself: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leisure in idlenesse, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understand) I was from my infancy ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benedict Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favours, and lastly with the Dignity of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessity of my present Office, before the sweetnesse of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Ubsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Favours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron John Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing: But when by the cheerfulness of your most Serene Countenance, You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princess of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Ubsal, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me, You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but besides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none so soon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer, that when you should think fit I might deliver to Pothier the Memory of things done or to be tranfacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after followed, caused them to be esteemed small ones; For when you desired the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civill and Moral Wisdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your InstrucTions therein being ignorant of your Purpose, that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the hidden I found you had Leant so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reigning, waging War, often holding Parliament, every day Council, and constantly disrafft with other business) you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that little wanting my help, you could hastily Translate him into Elegant Latine in most
The Epistle Dedicatory.

Significant Expressions, and of Your self observe and for true reasons Correct the Error of Translations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I respected for great and various fruits of purest pleasure, as I could not but often ingenuously confess to my most intimate acquaintance, That whatsoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care I bestowed in this employment (for Trouble, I call my Conscience to witnesse, I never felt any) I thought all abundantly recompened with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the presence of so great a Prince, to be seen and countenanced by You, to obtain the Title, Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happiness seemed so great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off these my worldly accoutrements, as knowing I must one day leave them or they me, yet out of impotency of mind I might by too great happiness have grown insolent, but that by certain Arguments learnt in time to know that so great a fortune was not conferred as Due to any man's Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this so high and great an Happiness there are many excellent Circumstances particularly considerable. I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is, I am so free that I am not employed and wearied in any service not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but also of my Modesty and Bashfulness: I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, to stand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly loosing time, or boldly venturing of my Liberty and Familiarity. Neither is my work base or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuse; whatsoever will not betray his own ignorance must needs confess the employment on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hitherto I have related part of the Favours you have bestowed on my Person; it remains likewise I should acknowledge those Favours (as much more bestowed on me which you have conferred on others by my Intercession: In which confession I have cause to fear, that I shall not only contract Envy to my selfe, but give Occasion to others to accuse your Majestie, as being too Facile in granting what is requested. To these I shall answer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodness, which hath far exceeded my Deferts, and that others also may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the same Respect that I have done: as first, I never desired anything but what was Just and Equal; nor secondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majestie of my Prince; thirdly, by all those Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this strait, wherein it is easier to think of more things then to write them, many things come into my mind which I am forced to pretermit. This I shall say, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majestie for small favors bestowed at my Request, or for the great ones; for as these carried the greater Price, the others did more manifest your Humanitie. That your mind capable of highest things would condescend to so little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Phyllophother asked of him a Groat, said, It was too little for a King to give; when he presently asked a Talent, said, It was too much for a Phyllophother to receive. Your Majestie hath more magnificently used the same Method, in Your smaller favours, regarding what was fit for me to receive, in the greater, what became your self to give. With the like Clemency You have had compassion on some miserable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majestie because none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet scarce speak, both for the Greatness of the Thing, and for the Greatness of the Thanks due, which cannot at present be expressed. But I may happily be accused of Folly, that I should think your favours may be more Elegantly declared or praiied by any man's Oration, then by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Commendation for having bountifully remitted to the City of the Vangiones the greater part of their Taxes, by which benefit I believe the City was preferred, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majestie as a second Foundress; You have hereby for ever obliged the Commonwealth of the Vangiones, and me in particular, making us your everlasting Debtors. For I know it who of Right oweth most to you, they who received the benefit or he who procure it at your Hands. Is there any thing can be equalled to, or preferred before what I have already said? Yes surely, even this. In that you have promised to make me a better man, not, as all men are improved, by Laws and Manners, nor, as many, by Example, but, as yet none, by Your care and Dilligence in Conversing with me: For you have promised to make Enquiry with me (that is to dire& and show me) how Wife and Prudent men ought to be qualified, and by what signs they may be discovered; which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better then now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I would not free your Majestie from your Obligation for half your Kingdom: And I shall not refuse, whensoever You Command, to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will, I suppose, be neither unpleasant to You, nor yet Difficult, seeing You tend forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find more who pretend to teach then do indeed truly know & understand it. In this thing I may well boast whereby I am more happy, not only then ordinary men, but the servants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom, but would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person, which we read not he ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the every Paper admonisheth me to make an end. I shall therefore now be silent, humbly adoring your Majestie, and giving You to understand, That not only this Book is Dedicated to your Majestie, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affections thereof, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your sake simply willing to do any thing whatsoever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, or beyond my Abilities to perform.

MAD'AM,

The Lord Preserve and Keep you.

LIVIUS HISTORY
By J. FREINSHEMIIUS.

THE FIRST BOOK.
In place of Livie's XI Book.

Collected out of Authors whose Names are in the Margin annexed.

The Power of the Samnites was now by many Battles much broken, neither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and strengthen his Spirits. Therefore Q. Fabius the Consul, now in the heat of his Youth, and affuring himself the glory of putting an end to this War, having made a sudden levy, marched incontinently with his Army into Campania. For the Samnites being an hardy people, and by all their overthrowes brought rather into Defeat then Fear, while the former Consuls carried back the Legions to Rome attending on their Triumph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the Relicks of their former Armies, and some new Levies, had gathered together a considerable force, and because they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Consuls were men not much to be feared, either for any experience in Marshal affair, or for any great Authority they had, they grew confident, invaded, depopulated, and wasted the Territories of the Campanians whom they had always hated, but now more vehemently, looking on them as the Authors of the dangers and calamities they now sustained. The Roman General had a heart no way misbecoming the dignity of his Fabian Family, but the small account he made of a Nation so often beaten by his Country-men, and his earnestness of being in action, did at this time quite bereave him of all Counsel and Deliberation. He marcheth swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite fronts, who upon flight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a flight of the whole, without any confideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all haste that may be the Battel to be begun, as if the hope of Victory confided only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumpect, had leaved on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and incensed the minds of their Souliers with their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battel was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great busines to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and furious march, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder then to fight. Three thousand of Fabius his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of the Night was the total destruction of his Army prevented. Then retiring to a more commodious place, as well as in such a Confermation may be expected, they fortified their Camp, where there was little better comfort or confidence then in the field, the Weary had no conveniency of rest, the Hungry wanted food, and the Wounded had no application of Medicines, for issuing out with their weapons only, they had left all their carriage and baggage in the former Camp: A
So that the whole night was passed away with the Groans of the dying, and the Complaints of the living, every one with horror and despair waiting for the next day as their last. For being tired with labour, dilapidated with long watchings, weakened with wounds, terrified with an unhappy overthrow, and their number much diminished, they thought it impossible to refit the enemy, whom they were found and entire both in body and mind, and filled with hopes of Victory, they were not able to encounter upon even terms. Things being at this ill pafs, the Remedy (as it often happens) proceeded from the enemies misfortune, who daunted with the Rumour of the other Consul's approach, and fearing lest he might assault Fabius his Camp, the new forces would surround him, contended himself with what successe he had above his hope obtained, and diverted his course another way. The Enemy being removed, the Romans likewise betook themselves to a safer Refuge; when these tidings were brought to Rome, the City was exceedingly moved, not so much with the loss, as the disgrace of the busines, and took it deeply to heart, That the longest war they were ever troubled with, when it was now just at a period, should by the rashnes of one Consul be revived again, and that more formidable then before, by reason of the great hopes and confidence which the Samnites would assume in contemplation of this their success. Neither was this the ease of the Tribunes of people alone, whose proper ait it was by their frequent Orations to fill the Citizens minds with envy and hatred, but even the Fathers, upon discourses of the busines, pronounced very heavy and severe sentences, and a Decree was made by the Senate, That Fabius the Consul should be commanded at a certain day appointed to come and plead his cause at Rome. He was no sooner at Rome, but a swarm of accusers flew about him; and indeed the fault could not be excused, and what was only left of moment on his behalf, even the esteem of old Fabius, was made use of as an argument against him; for they thought him least of all men to be persuaded, who being extracated from so illustrious a Parent, and brought up in the midst of his Fathers triumphs, had, by his Impudence with so foul an overthrow, cast a stain not only on the Roman Glory, but on the renown of his own Family, and the many victories of his Ancestors obtained. Their minds being thus exasperated (that it was not likely the Defendant should have a fair hearing) were first by the confideration of his Fathers eminent Piety, and afterward with his Oration totally appeased. For he fearing least for this miscarriage his person would be removed from his Command, intifit not at all in excusing the Crime, but modestly recounting his own and his forefathers merits, defined there might not be in his old age so ignominious a Character imprinted on the Fabian Family: Neither did he require that for the sake of so many other Fabii, who almost from the foundation of the City, had by their virtue and counsel augmented the Roman Empire; not that for the sake of those three hundred Fabii, who by their own deaths, and almost the total losse of the Fabian Name, had protected the Commonwealth, the error of one single person should be forgiven, if it were found remediless, and that a greater commodity would accrue from the punishment then the preservation of his son. But whatsoever was in the young man to be feared, is already come to pass, whereas unless we cut off our own hopes, I cannot lay by an unjust, but by an untimely severity. Those many good deeds which his spirit and lively Genius, which likewise his virtue (by me, by your esteem, none of the worthy Turces, being discipline and directed) doth fairly promise, are yet justly to be expected. It hath turned to the improvement of many mens wisdom and circumspection, that they miscarried in the beginning of Affairs, who being admonished of their error, have often recompened small losse with larger success; and I doubt whether it ought not rather to be imputed to the Envy of Fortune then to any mans fault, that the constant felicity both of the Commonwealth, and our Family, is by a small dimention thus interrupted; though indeed it is rather to be accounted the good will then the envy of the Gods, by whom providence it is come to pass, that with this overthrow, not so fatal to the City as effectual to our intruction, we are put in mind of our humane condition, to abate that deadly pride which is usually the effect of excessive Prosperity: Whatsoever the matter is Countrymen, I did certainly foresee some ill luck when upon the Convention of the Senate, I did earnestly solicit you would not create my Son Conful. For when I considered that my Father, Grandfather, Great-Grandfather, and other my Ancestors had frequently, and my self five times born that Office, I began to mistrust whether the Gods or Men would willingly, and with so equal a mind, suffer the supreme Honour to continue in the same Family. And I with my prayers had then prevailed, or that you would be pleased still to continue the benefit before, left what against my will, you confer'd on my Son as a Token of Honour, prove an occasion of unkindness to my Family both, small, leave your feives be suspected of Rashness, for posterity will judge, that either you conferred the command on Fabius without cause, or that without cause ye deprive him of it, if by a contrary Judgment ye shall destroy your former Sentence. But if you will please to decree things more laurably, both your own Authority, and the reputation of the Fabian Family shall yet stand found, and his youthful folly, as it was committed with some losse to the Commonwealth, shall be amended to its greater emolument and profit. But who dares promise these things? Truly, Countrymen, I will, even I will engage my self to the Commonwealth for my Son, and happy may it prove to the Senate and People of Rome, and our own private Family; I will also go Legate to the Conful, and partake of whatsoever fortune he shall happen either to find or to make. My spirits are yet vigorous, neither, considering mine age, is the strength of my body much
In place of Livic's Eleventh Book.

...much decayed, I can perform a Souldiers duty, I can stand in Battel, and if to all things else I were impotent, yet with the Memory of my Former victories I can both terrifie the Enemy and Encourage our own Souldiers: and, which is of greatest concernment, I can with Councill and Caution temper and direct the impetuous Heat of the Confall's youth which is the only Cause of the late Misfortune. If I knew not the Disposition of my foame, and were not assured he would embrace any good direction, I would not certainly now near the end of my life hitherto led without Blemish, after the bearing so many Confluffals both to my owne liking and yours, after signal victories and illustrious Triumphs, I would not hazard all my Glory purfaced with so many years travel and danger, at home and abroad, by trufling it to the Raffines of one in confiderate young man.

This Oration did both move the mindset of all who were present, and also ingenerate a Confindence of better Successes for the future. Old Fabius was by an Unanimous content created Legate, all preparations were made with what diligence care and Expedition might be: and the Confla took the field with no les favour and Hope of the People, then he had lately returned with their indignation and reproaches. Henceforward both in their march and in their Camps nothing was omitted either of good Discipline, or what the art and experience of an old General could ordaine, and those Companions whom C. Fabius the Father had by good turns, or by the admiration of his virtue obliged to himselfe, were very ready to perform whatsoever was enjoyned them; the Souldiers also greedily to blot out their former disgrace, and confiding in the Counfel of a Leader, under whose conduct they remembered the Sannites to have been often beaten by themselves: and their Fathers did earnestly desire opportunity of encountering the Enemy. On the other side the Sannites were no les elevated with contemplation of their late victory, so that one Party striving to retain their purcha'd Glory, the other to repair what was loft, they joyned issue mut vehemently with the all force and might on both fides; And now behold the Romans in a worse condition then before, C. Pontius Herennius the Enemies General having hem'd in the Conful with a select band: when Maximus observing the danger his fon was in, setting spurre to horse hings himself into the thicket of the Enemies Troopes: He was followed immediately by a Parry of Horfe, who beside the motion of their Own Courage were ashramed to see one Old man assault with a resolution to overcome so many skilfull young Lads in the flower of their strength. This sudden storme govern'd the Fortune of the whole Battel; The Roman Leages animat with the boldneffe of their Cavalrie, at firft well received the Enemy, and straightway repell'd them: Herennius in vaine refifting, who, that day performing all the Offices both of a good General and a good Soldier, endeavouring to rally his fides to retaine the Cordary, and with stand the affailants, could neither hinder the Flight of his Men, nor afterward find opportunity of escape for himself. Four thousand Sannites were taken with their Generals. The Battel and the flight swallowed up 24000. The Enemies Camp was likewise firiz'd on with vast Wonder in it, which was quickly much encreas'd by Forrage of their Grounds, and taking in of Towns both by Horfe and upon Mercy. This great change of Affairs was wrought by the access of one only Perfon, informous that the lately Victorious army is now routed by the Conquerer's party, and the Confla carries away captive that General by whom he was formerly himselfe shamefully beaten, which was a pleasing Spectacle to the Romans, and a great Ornament to his Triumph, which by the ready good will of the People he made into the City the next years. While the Fabius thus order'd things in Sannium, the other Conful D. Brutus (whose Province was among the Falisci) had the like happy Success: For being affilied by Sp. Carvillus his Legate (for twas thought fit to joyne a Legate with him, as a man skilful in war, to one that had experience of the Enemy, against whom laft year he did fortunate manage Affairs) he did waft no small of the Richs of Exturia, and ovcrcame in a felt Battel the Falisci daring to encounter him. Thefe news being brought to Rome, when the time of the Convenceng the Senate was come, and it seemed not fit for the Common-wealth to withdraw the Conflas from their charges, an Interregnum was agreed upon: The Regent L. Posthumius Megellus, in a Court of his holding, was himself declared Conful; a precedent till that day unheard of, unlaff in the Perfon of Appius Claudius, which nevertheless no good man approved. But Posthumius behaved himself in his Magistracy with as much arrogance as he auffum'd it: Being vainly puff't up with the Nobility of his Extraction, and this his third Conflhip, he did utterly despise his Colleague for this year, C. Junius Brutus as one much below him, being but a Plebeian. When the Provinces came to be disposed on, he would not suffer Brutus to be compared with him, nor lots to be cast, out of all Order claiming the Administration of the Sannitick warre as his Due, informous according to his own Saying, he had in his two former Conslhips done great things against that Enemy. The Business being canvass'd with much contention in the Senate, when C. Junius percieved he was not able to maintain his Right against the Grace and Power of his Colleague, did at length declare he would defi'me, left by the discord of the Consls the Publick good might be hinder'd. The Petition did still continually rage both in City and Countrie, for which having tried all remedies now for three years, they could not either with their divine or humane applications allay it. Wherefore consulting either with the books of the Sybils or the Oracle of Delphos (for this allso is reported) they sent Ten Ambaffadors to fetch Asellapinsius to Rome from Eipidamus where it is laide he was borne: For though the Answer were doubtful, neither could the Fathers foresee the event.
event of things, they thought fit to obey the Gods who would themselves open a way for their fortunes to proceed by: A very strange thing then fell out, but of most undoubted truth, by reason of the sincerity of so many Authors affirming it, as likewise appears by the structure of the Chappel in Tibur then erected and consecrated. When the Roman Embassadors had delivered their Message, the Epidaurians enter'd them kindly, but because it did not appear what was convenient to be granted them, they were conducted to the Temple with liberty to convey away what should seem convenient for their use. The Altars of this God among the Gracians was most commonly in open and high Places; the Epidaurus also five miles from their City had a Temple of greatest Fame in those days, and very rich by the gifts of men who believed their health to proceed from thence. Being brought hither, while they stood in admiration Behold an huge Serpent creeping out of a secret place fills all their minds with horror and Devotion: For the Priests with great veneration cryed out, The God himself is in this Snake, and being sometimes seen in this shape, it always imports a good and beseftful Omen. Two days was he seen in the Temple and then again withdrew himself; the third day through the midst of the throng of Spectators and Adorers he went directly to the Port where the Roman vessel attended them, and entering into the Ship, he rolls himself up according to his spiral manner, in the Cabin of Q. Oulinius, President of the Embaffy. There is an antient story that the same Eflapilus having assumed the form of a Serpent was carried by Epidaurus to Sicyon by a Tackle of Mules, are Nicaora, the wife of Echtaenius driving the maim.

The Romans rejoicing at the good Omen, as having the God himself present among them, hoisted flag, and in a few days with a prosperous Voyage, crossed the Seas and arrived at Antium; where the Sea being troublesome, and their navigations hindered; the Serpent which had kept itself still and quiet all the voyage, creeping out the Ship, glided to the Port of the most eminent Church in that City, and there abode three whole days together: The Romans much fearing they should never draw him from thence, seeing he had not in so long time returned to his wonted fulleness; but at length having regained him with much cheerfulness conveyed him to Rome: The whole City ran out to the sight of so incredible a wonder; on the banks of the river as he passed by many altars were erected, incense and sweet odours prepared, and sacrifices flain. They were now full come to that place, where Tibur a little dividing itself, suffuseth an island to appear in the midst of it, when the Serpent forsoaking the Ship betakes himself into it by swimming, and was not afterwards any more seen by man; hence was the place call'd the Island of Efphalipus. The Fathers all agreeing that the Gods had chosen that place, decreed a Temple to be there erected to Eflalipus. The Richness whether by this remedy, or that it had otherwise run its full course did suddenly cease; the Temple was quickly enriched with many extraordinary offerings, and its renown wonderfully spread abroad by those who profited to have received help in their diseases from this God. L. Posthumius the Conful carried the same pride with him into his Province which he had exercis'd against his Colleague at Rome: For whereas Q. Fabius Garatus, the last years Conful, did by order from the Senate manage affairs in Samnium as Proconsul, Posthumius arrogantly writes to him commanding him to depart from the Province, inasmuch as himself was sufficient to wage that War. Fabius anfwering with the Decree of the Fathers, and that it was not safe for him to defer a business imposed on him by the Senate, the Romans upon this news feared left by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be damned: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to send Legates to the Conful, to define in the Senate name that Fabius might be suffer'd to continue with the Army in Samnium. Posthumius having returned an abridg'd and broken Answer; added withal a speech of singular impudence: That during his Confulship, he was not obliged to obey the Senate, but they him, and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith dismissing the Legates, he marcheth with his Army to Comminium, which City Fabius did then besiege, revolting (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Arms had afforded the enemy a foul spectacle, if Fabius had relished with the fame he was affaught; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having proferted that he yielded not to the Confuls fury, but to the good of the Common-wealth. Posthumius in a few days reduced Comminium, whence leading his Army to Venius, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns, many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were slain, six thousand two hundred calling down their arms, yeilding themselves to the mercy of the conquerors. The Confuls achiwements were no way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters advise the Fathers that the City and Territory of Venius was very convenient for a Colony therin to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the counsels, other men had the conduet of the Colony of twenty thousand men; for so I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceeding belief, but that it seems reasonable, that in the midst of Nations, yet unbeseed they should think of placing a considerable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Lucanians. Now the flubbornets of Posthumius, as besides other grudges and offences, it contrived him much envy; so it tended much to encrease Fabius his Favour and good opinion with with all men, so, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily affected unto. Being now Proconsul he did on the Calends of January make his triumph over those Samnites who are called Pentri: Old Fabius followed his Chariot on horse-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not only an Ailiant, but the author of the Victory. He accumulated all the glory of the enterprise upon the people; Conful, using himself as the name, so the modestly of a Legate, beholding his sons honour with as much complacency, as when, being yet a little one he did in his own triumph carry him about in his Chariot. Part of the plunder was by the Conful divided among the soldiers, the rest laid up in the Treasury; and C. Pansa the Samnite being first led in Triumph was afterward beheaded: A flout man he was and of worthy memory, who in those days did a long time fulfil the Roman violence, gave them many considerable overthrowes, but of all the most flamable one at the Caudine Springs. He was reported to say, That he had beene referred to those days wherein the Roman should have learnt to receive money, he would no longer have suffered them to bear sway. It seems then the fortune of the City was not better defended by their industry in Arms, then their innocence of manners: In the mean time Pobliminus fretting no feis at the honour had beene granted his Rival, then that the like had been denied him, by weaknes of mind opposing his own contumacy, to the authority of the Fathers, did both exasperate the wound of his own spirit, and imitate those imaginations against him, which ought by modesty of speech and carriage to have beene allviaged. He abated not from complaints against his enemies, nor from reproaches against the Senate, and to spite the Fathers, he distributed the whole prey among the foiliours, and disbanded his army before a successeor could be fent him. He triumphed likewise contrary to the pleasure of the Senate, which, though some refer to his second Confuship, I believe more fitly agrees with this conjuncture, and it is so affirmed by authors of so mean credit in Histories. By these doings he drew new hatred upon himself, and he was no longer off office, but the two Tribunes of the people upon a fe day accused him: Besides what hath hitherto beene mentioned, 'twas objected against him, that before he march't armed Liu. Epit. 11, out of the City, he employed two thousand choice men out of his Legion to dig up a piece of ground, and detained them many days in this work, not remembering they were his soldiers, not his slaves, and were levied to enlarge the Publicks Land, not to manure his. Being earnestly preft with these Crimes, and in vain striving to clear himself, he was by the suffrage of all the Tribes condemned; his fuit was valued to stand him in two hundred thousand pieces of money. Now P. Cornelius Rufus, and M. Curius Dentatus entered their Confulships. Each of these with his Legions did wittily wait Samnium, depopulating their grounds, and ruinig their Cities, and in many fast battels having the upper hand compelled them to length to fire for peace, for having in fo many battels loft the prime of their Youth; and in Pentius the chief consul and conduct, they did by their Embassadors bent first to the Conful, and by their leave to Rome, obtain that now this fourth time a League might be renewed with them. 'Tis likely both the Romans even weary with bearing, were willing to conclude a difficult and miserable War, with the tranquillity of peace. I find the war with the Samnites to have begun when M. Valerius Corvinus was the third time Conful, A. Cornelius Cotta being his Colleague, and being through four and fifty Confulships, with various successes continued (only by some short-lived truces suspended) it held both parties in play with much trouble and vexation; whether Cornelius triumphed for this War was uncertain; as for Manius there is no place, for his fortune being more eminent in that he subdued other enemies, he triumphed twice in the same Confulship: For the Sabines a Warlike Nation, now grown wealthy with a long peace, were no longer moved with their own proper compation, and Entreaties of the Samnites; or whether willing timely to prevent those miseries (which having swallowed up their neighbours) they foreawake approaching to themselves, having put their young men into Arms, invaded some places under the Roman Jurisdiction: Against these did Curius lead forth his Army, and that he might both divert the enemies, and give the Sabines some tattles of the miseries of War, he sent part of his forces by privy journeys into their territories with instruction that spreading themselves as much as could be, bringing terror and vaillation on every place: This straight did soon dissolve the formidable Army of the Sabines, several Nupets running several ways to the defence of their own substance; so that the Conful had an easie Victory over the dispersed forces. In this Expedition they proceeded as far as the Adriatic Sea, gaining the poiffession of so much ground, and so many men, as the saying of Curius began to be famous, who (according to the genius of those times being more ready in deeds then in words) when he could not express every singular circumstance, in gross expres himself, That he had taken so much ground; it must needs have turned into wildernes, but that he had taken a proportionable number of men; and that he had taken so many men, they must of Illust: c.33. need not have perished with hunger, but that he had taken a proportionable extent of ground. When the Sabines sued for peace, not only that was afforded them, but likewise the Freedom of the City, (though without the suffrage of the Tribes) this favour was in memory of their old Affinity under Tatin. the late War not being carried on with any malignant hatred. Of the next years Confulship (underwent by M. Varterius Corvius, and Q. Catrius Notius) we have arrived to little understanding; only I find some Colonies about this time deduced to Castrum, to Adria (from whence the Sea taketh its name) and to Senna in Gallia; Nevertheless consider- ing those Regions were not as yet to such a purpose sufficiently fledt, I think fit rather to enclive to other Authors who refer the beginning of those Colonies to after-times: But in the City for restraining many villanous and outrageous daily committed, there was a new Magistracy constituted under the name of Capital Triumvir, who were appointed Judges and Moderators to take cognizance of offences, to imprison the guilty, and, when occasion was, to inflict punishments.

The words of the Law in that case made by L. Papirius, Tribune of the people, I find to be these, Whenever shall hereafter be Prætor to give judgment among the Citizens, let him require of the people three Capital men, and those three men, whoever shall be chosen, let them exact sacrifices, let them judge, let them be of equal authority, as by the Laws and decrees of the people they ought to exact, to judge, and to be. In which clause commissio is likewise given of requiring Mullets or Fines, for in those days that piece of mony which was disbursed by way of punishment, was called a Sacrament, because (thet publick sacrifices being many, and the Treasury but low) it was delin'd to be expended in sacrifices.

Of the Taxes that year, there is no other memory left, but that two hundred seventy three thousand Citizens were rated. That this year Cenfor did likewise choose Q. Fabius Maximus, Prince of the Senate, there is a likely conjecture, which is otherwise confirmed, for that honour did constantly remain in three of that Family successively; as for example, Maximus received it from Ambusius his father, and transmitted it to his son Gaius. While affairs were in a great state abroad, they were troubled with discord and sedition at home. The Commonalty being far in debt, required a general discharge by publick authority for all debts and bonds paffed aforetime, without any satisfaction; this was an old divice, and for two hundred years and upwards variously agitated, even as any turbulent Tribune should exasperate them, or the Exortion of Ulurors move their indignation. Under the former Consuls, the fear either of the Peltigne or the Enemy did smother these contentions in some measure; but Q. Marcus Tullius and P. Cornelius Arvina being Consuls, and the year ensuing M. Claudius Marscculus, and C. Naunius Ruflius bearing office, they broke out most violent, for the appeasing whereof, more then for any other occasion, a Dictator was created, whom I take to be Appius Claudius, who was afterwards surnamed Cæsus, in as much as among ancient monuments I find him to have been Dictator.

Besides the hardships of unconcionable fury, the villanous luft of C. Plutius added fire to the peoples minds now already hotly disposed, causing them the sooner and more vehemently to break out into flame. T. Viturius (the son of that Viturius who being Conful was delivered red up to the Samnites for an unworthy League made with them) by reason of his domesfick calamities, overcharged with debt and not able to pay, was forced to yield himself slave to Plutius, patiently performing all servile duties. Plutius not content to have reduced to this base condition a young man of excellent Beauty, of a Confular Family, and likewise of great hopes, did moreover attempt to corrupt his Chastity, having before deprived him both of Estate and Liberty.

But Viturius disdaining and resolving to suffer any thing rather then commit so horrid a wickedness, was with most grievous stripes tormented, whereupon he thrust himself forth into the publick, and being by the multitude conducted to the Conful's Tribunal, he complains of the cruelty and luft of his Creditor, shewing withal the bunches and fresh marks of the lathers. The Conuls therefore judging it a business not to be neglected, informed the Senate thereof, where upon sentence paff, Plutius was condemned to prison, and by a Law in that case established, All men whatsoever through the whole City had bound themselves flaves for debt, were fet at liberty. I am not ignorant that instead of T. Viturius some Authors make mention of Publius, the son of a Colonol, who was one of the contrivers of the Caudine peace. Forty years before this, for the like cause, was a Law made for the annulling such Indentures; nevertheless the Ulurors growing so hard-hearted, and the former Law, by the patience of Debtors (refusing nothing in the midle of their penury) being by degrees neglected, 'twas though fit they should be admonished by so freth an example to provide more full and diligent caution for the future. But the people desiring to be freed not only from their Indentures, but from the Extortion of Ul money, were not satisfied with that Law though favourable to their revengeful minds. And (as in some more acute diseases, the pain is rather intended by a gentle application of medicines then remitted) not long after the matter was so Exacerbated, that when the Tribunes of the people with their great endeavours contended for a Law concerning Letters of Proteccion from Creditors, and that the Creditors did with equal force and animosity resist: The Commonalty after the example of their Ancestors, quitting the City, retired cros the water to Mounts Janiculius, resolvery never, without obtaining their requeset, to return to their own hot-hould-Gods. The Consuls finding little remedy against this tumultation (M. Valerius Patrians, and C. Aelius Patrus are thought then to be Consuls) they were fain to flie to the left refuge in disordered times, and create a Dictator, who was Q. Hortensius; he applying what the Time and the Cause seemed to require, and understanding the main breach of peace to consist in this, That the people were fenible of the violation of their Decrees, and the Publilian Law, thought fit to yield to the times, (though many strove against this opinion) and by a new Law made in the Eucule, he diligently provided, That whatsoever the Commonalty should ordain, all the Romans should be obliged unto. With these Lenitives the people being reduced to concord, and returned to their own house, the Dictator, either by the sudden force of his disfarte, or overwearied with care care and pains, dyed during the time of his Magistracy, which had hapned to none before.

Henceforward for a while there was less dilention at Rome; but the Dignity of the Empire began infensibly to decrease, in as much as the Commons not being guarded against the fraudulent proceedings of Ambitious men, and yet earnest to manifest their authority, accepted of any motions, and decreed many things tending to the disgrace of the Publick, and at last struck at the very Foundation. A singular Leffon to those who are involv'd with the guidance of affairs, seeing the vulgar, if their own private businesse proceed fairly, seldom meddle with things of an higher nature, not to provoke them by injuries and oppreffions of great ones to aspire to a Domination they know not how to manage. About this time I believe was the Law made concerning fufferages, which the Fathers, to the danger of their own Courts, were fain to authorize. For hitherto it had prevailed that no man executed any magistracy by the peoples votes, unless the Senate attented thereunto.

The Improvident vulgar did for some time contain themselves within their former bounds, and though they seldom contradicted the Fathers Sentences, yet they were always feared as having power to do so. But then Manius the Tribune made a Law whereby the peoples Authority was much augmented, but the wholome, and honourable severity of the Senate much weakened. Wherein the Dictator being dead, some report another was chosen to administer affairs, to wit, Fabius Maximus: if so, this was his third Dictatorship. L. Victorius, C. F. C. N. is said to have been Master of his horse; for there was war at this time with the Volscians of the Etruscan Nation, which was very seasonable to clear Rome of the editions, and those who retained the spirit of the former Dictord. There was likewise occasion found of waging war with the Lucanians, who being troublesome neighbours, had by many injuries compell'd the Thurines (a City of that part of Italy called Great Greece) to betake themselves to the Roman Protection: And C. Elusius the Tribune propounding a War against the Lucanians, the people decreed it. The armies therefore were drawn into the field, and in each place things performed, the memories whereof, with the Annals of those who wrote them, is perished. The Thurines beffowed on C. Elusius a flatue and Crown of gold. Next follows the Conulfhip of C. Claudius Caninus, and M. Emilius Lepidus, whereof no memorable thing is delivered to posterity; only the Etruscan and Lucanian war seem to have been still in being. There is also on Record an Oration of Curio concerning the Lucanians, which is to be referred to one of his four Triumphs, for so often I find he Triumphed. But in what yeare, or illust.38 with what Magistracy involv'd, he manag'd those affairs is uncertain.

Burthens of greater weight were now ingendring, which were attended with a very considerable slaughter, for a war was now arisien between the Senones a people of Galia. They had often warre and often peace with the Romans; and now, after their last overthrow in the fields of Seninus, where, Destus having Devoted himselfe to Death, a great Number of their men were slain, had lien still for almost ten yeares; Only they had suffer'd their young men to be hired by the Etruscans against the Romans. But now marching into Eturia, with a greater power then they had usually done, they Believed Aretins. Now the Aretines had before this requested a league with the Romans, which being denied they did nevertheless obtaine a Truce, whome Termes was not yet expired. But herein did their chiefest Hope of succour confil, because the Romans always thought it mainly concerned them to have the Gauls beaten. Wherefore sending Embajdadors to Rome they craved assistance against the common enemy. In the mean time the yeare was gone about wherein C. Servilius Tucca and Lucius Cæcilius Metellus were Conuls, in head of Cæcilius some annals mention Galba; But the lesser Nobility of the Cælian family is thought not to have attained the Confular dignity till the yeare from the foundation of the City six hundred and sextie.

Cornelius Dolabella, and Ct. Domitius Calvinus being Consuls, when the Terrou of the Gallique warre began againe to move it selfe, and news was brought that many of the Tufcans had annoyed forces with the Senones, the Fathers thought the Danger of the Aretian a thing not to be neglected by them: And because they could neither recall Dolabella from the Volvisians, nor Domitius out of Lucania without great hindrance to their affairs, The Fathers ordain L. Cecilius Metellius the last years Consull, and now Praetor, with all haste to Leave an army, and raise the siege of Aretium; Nevertheless left the warre thould seem to be rashly undertaken, they thought fit to send Embassadors before, to Declare that Aretium was under the Roman Protection, and that the Gauls being in League with them would doe more justly, if they would not lead their Army against their Friends and Companions. The message being prorom'd among the Senones, Britomara a fierce young man of the Royall Blood, whose Father had been slain by the Romans amongst the Etrurian auxiliaries, burning with devise of Revenge, cau'd not only the men, but the Ensignes of their fac'd Office to be hewne and torne in Pieces. The Rumour of so horrid a fact being related in Rome and in the Camp of Dolabella, their minds were vehemently incendi'd, and warre prorom'd against the Senones; and Dolabella forthwith leaving the Etrurians, marcheth with his Army through the Sabines, and Picenians territories with very long journeys into the Countrey of the Senones, who terrifi'd with this sudden Invasion, now in the absence of their main strength, taking the field with a small and inconsiderable body were easily routed and overcome. The Consull giving the Enemy no Breath, Burns up his Townes, demolisht his Buildings, defoll'd the whole land, and having slain the youth and carried away the weaker multitude of Women and Children left very little signe that ever that Countrey had been inhabited by Mankind. Britomara himselfe being taken and punisht with various and exquitous Tormentes was reserv'd for the Triumph; At the same time things did not so prospcrously at Aretium; For L. Cecilius Metellus had ill fortune in his fight before the Town and the Senones, even Colonells with many other men of Note, together with the Praetor himselfe were slaine, and of their Legions and Auxiliaries about Thirteen Thouland were wanting.

But the Joy for this victory prevailed not so much with the Gauls, as sovcru and Confraction for the Lamentable Defolatation of their Country; Wherefore gathering together all their Country men then in Armes in Etruria, full of Grief and Anger, void of Counsell and hope, having no habitation whereeto to be receiv'd at home, (I know not what Fate drawing them to their destruction) in a heat of Resoluution they drive toward Rome, thus Computing, That there is no other way to recompence the defolatation of their own Country, but by forcing the Romans to see the like Ruine of their City, That their Spirits and Forces were now no whit inferior to, nor the cause of their March from Aretium of les importance, than that of their Ancestors who march'd from Clusium of the same Etruria and took Rome: With the like speeches incendiing themselves they Ruff on, by nature impatient of Delay, and now hally in their Counsels, that they might overwhelm their Enemies unawares; But travelling through an Enemies Country, they met with many obstacles, so that the Romans had Leisure to provide against this Fury. At length wandering through unknowne and unfriendly places, guided by no certaine Line, they light upon Domitius the Consull, and immediately joyne Battell with him; But their unhappy rashnes confounded both their Reasone and Discipline: many being slaine in Battel, the residue growing mad with Rage and despai're threateing in their own Bowells, those weapons they had in vain drawn against the Enemy. Inſomuch as so sudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late most flourishing People for their villany in murthering Embassadors, that in the space of few months they were totally cut off, and ceas'd any more to be numbered among Nations, whose laws they had violated and Transgressed; For even the small Remnant of the Senones who had betaken themselves to their Neighbours, and Kimfens the Boii, were the next year by Dolabella the Consull with an universal slaughter clean swept away. For whereas the Boians and Etrurians were involve'd in these late disasters, and possellest with fear of the same Calamities they were at the Lake called Vadimonis in a fet Battell overcome, many of the Etrurians slaine, few of the Boians escaped, the very name of the Senones so utterly extinct, that... that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had set Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans having now an entire possession of their Countrie, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army with young men now grown up, ventured once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Then it was I believe by L. Amilinus Papus that they were beaten, for his and C. Fabrius his first Consulship happe"d that year, and sl"c certain that Etruria fell to Papus by Lot. But in moal Annals yet extant, the Memory of these Transactions is swallowed up by the Intervening of greater matters. For whereas the Romans had by so many continuall fights and victories very mightily encreased their Virtue and Power, all the free Cities and Nations in Italy being brought into feare, confirded in a great and most dangerous warre, joyning together all their Counsells and forces as against a Common Enemy, and Panderer. Neither thought they fit any longer to deferre their Designe, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurians sufficienc to drack the Roman Powers. And first of all the Sammites, again breaking their League and openly joyning force with the Lucanians and Brutians commenced the Warre. But there were overcome by C. Fabrius in many pitch'd fields; especiallly in one most probable when they joynd their Battell near the City of the Thurines, which Statius Statilus had again frightfully beleaguered, where the Enemy was with a very great slaufter beaten, and their Camp likewise forced and taken. It is reported that while the camp was fireuously defended, A young man of large proportion of Body was seen to Ladders to the works, whereby the Romans being animated obtained a complete victory. Twenty Thouland are saies to be slain in the fight and in the Camp, Five thousand together with the General taken Pri"nions, and twenty Colours. The next day the Confull reverting to reward those whose valour had been eminent, and promising a Corona Vallantis to him who first entered the Enemies Camp. After diligent Enquiry made after the man, the fouldier was not to be found (if he or he were a fouldier) who would claim this Honour, "Twas therefore believed and voiced abroad that Mars was the Author of this feat, and the Cause of Victory; And by the Confull's order supplication was made unto him, which the fouldiers with Laurells on their heads performed with great Joy and Gladness. The Tarentines had not as yet affiled the Accomplices with any open aid: for though they were the Principal Authors of the Confederacy, yet they thought it wiser to let the Roman forces be provoked and the Fortune of warre tried with other men's danger then their own. But this Diffimulation served not their purpose, for a meer accident provoking the Rarfehens of the Giddy rabble betrayed all their Counsells. Even at this Time, that part of the Italian shore, after the Manner of the Gracians (by whom Tarentus and molt of the other Cities were builded) did excellently delight themselves with fights, and stage plays: The Tarentines above others were molt Luxurious in this kind, infomuch as it is said they had more Feste and Solomons Plays then Days in the Year. It hapned they were then set at their sports in the greater Theatre by the Haven side, when L. Valerius (some say Cornelius) one of the Admirals of the seas was defcrying entering the Haven with ten Roman Vessells; A Fatal Errour to both Parties. For the Romans ignorant of all thinges betook themselves thither as to a friendly and amicable shore; The Tarentines on the other side Conscience of their own Privye practices interpreted this Navy to be fent with an hostile Intention. There was then present one Philipnarus whom for his loose Conversation the Citizens call'd Thais, He mentioning the articles of some former Leagues, said it was lawful for the Romans to faile pat the Promontory of Lacinium, & that therefore they should go out and meet the wholesome Barbarians, and suppress their Pride wi"h a Michelle. The giddy Rout befotted with continual drunckings manifest their afflent by Acclamation, so that one scandalous perfons opinion in a matter of so great importance was generally received, and withowt further Consideration they take up arms, and assault the Ships: The Romans as not dreaming of any fuch Encounter, being utterly unprepar'd to fight, betook themselves to flight. The Tarentines swiftly purifying, Five ships only made by their Ecape; as many being hemm'd about were brought into the haven, whereof four with the Admiral were drown'd and one taken. The Men, as many as were of age and strength fit for Warre, were flaine, the rest made slaves. Prefently with the same vanity they wage warre against the Thurines, accussing them, That the Romans came into their City pats by their mine; who though they were Gracians, had yet in the time of their diffents chosen a Barbarous Nation to be their Protector, rather then the Tarentines their Neighbors and Kinmen. The City is taken and plundered, the Chief men call out and banith'd, and the Romans Garrison compounding for their own safety are dismissed. The Romans hearing the Newes, were according to the Greatnes of the Injury molt exceedingly incensed, yet thought it not convenient at that season to undertake a new warre: An Embassay was decreed to complain of the Outrage, and inforcement was given the Legates to Require, That the Captive should be set at Liberty, the Thurines goods or the just value of them should be restor'd, the Exiles call'd back, and the Accomplices of thofe Midstemeans delivered into the bands of the Romans. The Tarentines according to the Greeke Vulifie were wont to assemble their People together in the Theatre; whether the Embassesadours being with much Difficulty admitted, they had a Rabble-route totally debaucht with Drunkens and Idenefs, for this likeness was a great Holy-day with the Tarentines. Ther'e when L. Pufibnnum the Prince Legate begin to declare his message, he was entertained with such mock and scoffs of the wanton multitude, that he carried home greater causes of hatred then he came to complain of. For they had him in such contempt, that not regarding anything else he spoke, when, as being a Roman, he chance to pronounce any word not so exactly according to the Greek manner, the whole company would burst out into laughter, crying out upon him and reviling him as a Barbarian, they jest and flourished at the Habit of the Embassadors, for they came in their gowns, and at last fairly thrust them out of doors, in vain claiming the privilege of the Laws of Nations. Now, what is scarce fit to be spoken, but may prove of good example to curb the insolence of popular licene, it is reported, That as the Embassadors pressed through the crowd of the Tarentines out of the Theatre, a certain buffoon, one Phoebiones (for in this the Tarentines were beholding to the good manners, the Names of their Jeffer were recorded in their Annals, though their Princes were forgotten) like an impudent Dog, puffed upon the sacred Vegments of the Embassadors. This might seem the crime of one only mad furious fellow, but that forthwith the whole drunken society did own it, and the whole Theatre re Reloaded with laughter, and clapping of the hands, as approving the fact. Pothinum lifting up his voice, he, accept this, O men, O Jeffer (if th') seeing ye before close things upon us we required not at your hands. And when he turned himself to the multitude shewing his defiled garment, they renewed their laughter, and began to dance, singing furious and reproachful Verses against the people of Rome, wherefore Pothinum again crying out, Laugh on, laugh on, Tarentines, while ye may, for hereafter ye shall keep sufficient: Whereat the Tarentines were nettled, Nay, faith he, to vex you the more, I tell you before hand, this garment I sold you much blood the washing. After this, receiving no other answer, they failed home. Now at Rome, L. Aelius Barbula and L. Marcus Philippos, had begun their Consulship, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robes defiled, as it was, being shewed by the Embassadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole series of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their spirits were in an high manner incensed, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with so many mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to send an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many days even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing should be enterprised before the other Cities, at least those near Tarentines were reduced; others contended, That the war should incontinent be commended; at last, number in their votes, it was decreed, That the business of the Tarentines war should be refered to the people.

The people with an unanimous consent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were sent to Aemilius the Consul, who was then gone to the Army into Samnium, That omitting all things at present, he should pitch his Camp in the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure satisfaction for the injuries received, that he should prosecute them with a just and holy War. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unarmed men, but a just and well order'd Army, roaring themselves out of their accustomed fortitudes, began seriously to enter upon counsel, what was to be done, in order to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in satisfaction was base, and to avoid both impossible: While their opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest stood up and said, Why do we thus, O Tarentines, wait the time in vain alterations; the times are come which require Deeds rather then Words, which that they may be order'd to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech and sincere Counsel. Neither am I much mov'd that heretofore, by a strange disagree incident to Free Cities, ye have been delighted with flattering and sugar'd Orations, though of ill consequence, because then, as in time of Prosperity, ye regarded not much what mainly tended to the good of the Commonwealth: But now the Roman Army is upon our Borders, and the fear of the enemy before our Gates, and this is sufficient to instruct us to prefer what is Profitable before what is Pleasing. Neither would I have you so interpret me, as if I stood up to hit you in the teeth with past misdeemors; for unreasonably to object old crimes is the part of an enemy, and one who wantonly insults over others infirmities; And an honest man that is careful of the common safety, will hide and excuse the faults of his City, unless the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding some publick Calamity. For seeing we are but men, to pretend freedom from all error, would argue too much Pride: But often to fall at the fame stone, and not to grow wiser when the very event plainly chastiseth our ruffness, is not consistent with right reason. We have at one man's warning affaunted and domined the Roman ships, and presently with open war vexed our Kinmen the Thurrines, because they had rather be protected by the Romans, than swallowed up by the Lucanians and Brutians; moreover, we have suffered shamefull indignities to be cast on the Roman Embassadors; so that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, hath in a most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now pitch't in our fields, and we as yet wavering in our counsel, deliberate still whether it be safer to accept a formidable war, or make a dishonourable peace. And I would to God at length, that laying aside all self-flattery, and forgetting self-interest, and aiming at the publick honour and profit, we might freely and truly consult together, there might certainly a way be found of making an honest league, or a safe war. But now I see you clearly divided into two parts, I may say factions, not taking counsel out of judgment or the state of things require, but every man by-by asfbffed by his own inclination. For how comes it to pass that so few of the young men, and poorer fort stand for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men desire war? what other reason can be given of so equal a division in the City, but the that would fain in quiet reap the commodity of their Lands and Liberty, the other in time of war, hope for command and liberty of plunder? This is an old disease amongst us, neither of a long time hath our Commonwealth wanted such men, who even with the danger and detriment of the City have studied to increase their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I must speak what I think at present most conducible) if ye will neither buy peace on such false conditions as shall infringe the privileges of a Free City, nor yet truft singly to your own Forces in so difficult a war. Our Ancillors have often conducted the command and command of our Armies to foreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponnese or out of Sicily we have sent for Archidamus the fon of Agesilaus, afterward for Clennymus, then presently for Agisbelis. Even in our own memory were we inflerted by our Neighbours, our Fathers made use of Alexander the Epit: By which means they did not only themselves succeed prosperously, but left things in a flourishing condition to us. There is at this day the same friendship between us and the Epitros, neither are they now leffe potent in an Army and a Commander: And the benefit is fresh in memory, which Pyrrhus received from us, in that with our whole Navy we assisted him in his attack against the Corecyraus. Therefore esteem this not as my counsel, but as the counsel of the wiseft men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, which ye ought therefore at least to follow, because in the former example you may discern both the reason and ground, as also the idle and successor of it. And yet otherwise, there may be arguments most evident and sufficient to the fame purpose: There is no man amongst us so singularly eminent, to whom all the rest will willingly submit themselves, and what danger there is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are not ignorant. And whatsoever ye shall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his ambition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to say, that 'tis not safe to commit a war into the hands of any ordinary person against the Romans, an hardly stout Nation and inured to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrhus is not by any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Military affairs. But perhaps he will not come. Certainly, being a man desirous of action, and having no other war at present, he will not come himself, but bring a formidable strength, and that of no fresh-water soldieers. And if ye fear his encroachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on such conditions as the Commonwealth may be secure. By this means ye may either obtain an honourable peace, or be gain a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the least of my hopes, that the Romans will rather beforehand deal with us on equal terms then admit of Pyrrhus into Italy, having heretofore feared a King of much lefs glory and renown out of the fame Epitros. This counsel prevailed not only so far, as to make them fee a probable way open to the publick safety, but likewise the assembled being divided into two contrary opinions, neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimously concur in this, as seeming indifferent to both sides.

'Tis reported, when the Rumour was spread about the Cipie, that a decree was made for the invitation of Pyrrhus that one Meton a covetous fellow, taking a dry wither'd chapplet upon his head, after the manner of Drunkards, together with his mind, entred the Theatre; the people according to their idle tumult, commanded him to sing and his woman to pipe, after a while silence being made, Meton crys out, To doe well, O Tarantines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that please, to sing and Dance; for when Pyrrhus once comes into the Cipie we shall scarce be allow'd to live after our own minds. The People being somewhat moved at this saying, and murmurs and whisperings arising: Those who were authors of the injuries against the Romans (fearing less if peacefull Counsellors prevailed they should be delivered up to punishment) having chid the people, That they would suffer themselves to be unworthy deriv'd by a rafte fellow, forcibly thrust Meton out of the Theatre, so that afterward without contradiction the Decree was ratified. But the Roman Cipul, hearing nothing from the Tarantines tending to peace, and understanding that Embaffadours were sent with presents to Pyrrhus, Orifus 4. 2 lets himself to the War, walteth their grounds, taketh their Cities lome by force, some by composition, and fills all places with losse, and terror. The Tarantines send forth forces to hinder the spoile, but, after a sharpe conflict, the Romans having the better, the Gracians are driven backe into the Cipie with great losse. Then Aemilius without reliance walteth and burneth the whole Country round about. The Tarantines terriffed with these calamities, (like a people, the more influent in prosperitie, the more deject and peacefull in adversitie) submit themſelves to the Government of Age, who was a constant author of maintaining the Roman friendship. Their desire and hopes of peace were much augmented by the discourse of some prime men who were difmiffed by the Confull, and declared his Humanity, with what In-dulgence and candeur he entertain'd those who were taken in several places of the Country, or in the last fight. But the confidence of Cineas was now come with Auxiliaries from Epirus changed their minds, and erected their Spirits. For Pyrrhus being a man of vall conceits, and in emulation of Alexander the Great, comprehending large Empires in his fancy, believed now a way to be laid open to accomplish all his designs, as if the Fates themselves had invited him.
The Supplement of Livie, Book II.

Tis said he was much confirm'd by the Oracle of Delphi, whole words were indeed of an ambiguous sense, which yet the Kings ambition did favourably interpret. For consulting about the War he was now to undertake, Aniwer was made, Peace enim Romanos vincere, that he should overcome the Romans, or the Romans him. But I think his chief encouragement was from the Tarentine Embassador who affirm'd, That one of their own Cities, with the help of the Locrini, the MessapiANS, Samnites and other the confederates, they could easily raise twenty thousand horse and three hundred and fifty thousand foot. With this strength, when he should once have brought the Romans under subjection, he hoped with little pains to attain the Lordship of all Italy, then a short cut into Sicilia would present him with an illand much at discord and void of a Ruler (the families of Agathocles being destroy'd) and this he thought he might claim by right of Inheritance, as having begotten Children on Lussa the daughter of Agathocles, these things happily succeeding he was resolved to make War with the Carthaginians. Tis reported that Giscus, a man of excellent wisdom, willing to have the King by his own confession acknowledge that his immoderate desires, whereby the enjoyment of his present felicity was disturb'd, were in reason to be restrained, asked him, What would he do when he had overcome the Romans? Pyrrhus then declaring how one victory would beget another, And what shall We do, while all these things are successful? Why then, faith Pyrrhus, we will enjoy the fruits of Peace, the benefit of safe and idleness. To which Cineas replied, And why, O Kings, cannot we at present enjoy the same things, while they are in their hands? whereas the undertaking of new Wars may utterly deprive us of them. But a second embassys coming from the Tarentines, Pyrrhus overcome by his own ambition, answer'd, That 'twas the custom of the Ephires to wage War, not only for themselves, but for their companions and friends. But to dissemble his more secret counsels, he articles very prejudicial with the Embassadors, That as soon as he had relieved them, he should be suffer'd to return home, and not be detain'd in Italy any longer then necessity should require. Then with all might and main intending himself upon preparation for the War, he cuteth a great number of long ships to be made ready, and likewise trims up others for transportation of men and horse. Now having Employed most of the Italian Embassadors (whom under a pretext of honour he detain'd as hostages and pledges) in levying men and conducting of forces, he sent the rest beforehand to Tarentum, with three thousand armed men and Cineas for Commander. By their arrival all hopes of peace were broken off, Agis his government abrogated, and by decree of the people the guidance of affairs committed to one of them who were now returned from Ephire. Not long after Mio being sent by the King, secures the Tower of Tarentus with a Garrison, and claims the custody and defence of the walls, with the very good will of the multitude, who were glad to see strangers undertake all the trouble and labour, while they safely enjoy'd their rest, they therefore cheerfully decreed Corn for the fouldiers and Mony for Pyrrhus.

In the mean time L. Emilius understanding of the Arrival of these beyond-sea fouldiers, that he might have the faiwer winter quarters, resolv'd to draw his faymly into Lucania. His journey was by certain narrow passages shut in on the one hand with the Sea, on the other with rugged and impassable Rocks. The Tarentines having intelligence of his purpoe, fall'd by that fторre with their ships furnish'd with Cross-bows and Slings, affaulting the fouldiers as they pass'd through tracts and open paths with filones and darts. But Emilius, not being able to help himfelf by virtue, forc'd his path by cunning; the Captives which before he had plac'd in the Rear, he now draws to that fide of the ranks which was obnoxious to danger, in pity of whom, the Tarentines fearing to hurt their own men, spared alfo the enemy. These things were done at Tarentus this year. At Rome C. Fabrius Luscius, who in his Confulhip had egregiously overcame the Samnites, and Lucaniates entered the Capital in Triumph. L. Marcius not many days after obtained the fame honour, being return'd out of Etruria with prosperous succes. The reason why, the Etrurian war not as yet being finifh'd, he was call'd out of his Province at fuch a time of year (for Fabrius triumph'd the third of the Nones of March) is not recorded. I conceive he was recall'd by the Senate, who being troubled with expectation of Pyrrhus, did from every quarter gather together what strength they could. The Proletari, the fith and lafl rank of Citizens, who of old were privilidge'd from going to war, were now lifted, and being not able by reafon of their poverty to provide themselves with arms, they were furnish'd by the publick, for at this time war being on every fide commenced, it was neceffary the Commonwealth should be defended by many Armies. These mens office was, while the Legions were otherwife employ'd, to guard the City with watch and ward, being difpofed in several flations upon the walls, and in the Market-place. Neither by all these contrivances could the imminent calamities have been averted, but that the fortune of a City ordain'd to Rule did in these most dangerous times produce men of fo great Excellency, as I know not whether ever the could boast of better: Men, not fo eminent for their Riches or Exlration, as truly ennobl'd by their Virtue and contempt of wealth. This Age had its Curi, Fabrii, Corvinius, men of no great Ancestors or Poflellions, but of molt ample fame, which they obtained by their upright example, exact skill in Marchall affairs, and an unfeawable innocenc of Manners; who were every where helpful to their Country, which had now need of Champions, which were able not only to refit the fword of the enemy, but to fcor the gold, having to deal with a King who was potent in both. In the mean time Pyrrhus, not waiting for the Spring, coming with with two and twenty Thousand foot, three thousand horse, twenty Elephants, and a considerable band of slingers and archers, was in the midst of his Voyage so tossed with a Tempest, that he narrowly escaped being cast away. For the Navy being dispersed, and most of the ships dispersed, when the Admiral was in danger, Pyrrhus leap't into the sea, and with very great pains at length hardly swam to shore: But the strength and spirit of his mind did much help the weakness of his Body, together with the diligence of the Meffapians, on whose shore he was cast, who with all offices of humanity did foment and cherish him: with their alacrity likewise, some few ships, which had escaped the violence of the storme, being brought into the Haven, there were gathered together some few horse, with two Elephants, and under two thousand footmen, with this force he marched to Tarrentus, being met by Citoius who care'd with his soldiers to conduct him thither, and being entertained with much joy he took his relf for some days: In which space having observed the Manners of the City to be so order'd, that unless they were amended, there was no possibility of protecting it, but that rather the Patrons themselves would likewise be undone by it, he took no open notice at the present. But a while after, his dispersed ships meeting together, when he had strength sufficient, he shut up their wrangling places, and Porches, where the idle youths use to spend whole days in walking and fouldering; he forbade their Banquets and Drinking-matches, and reduced their solemn Games from Intemperance to a just Medioricity.

After this he made a very strict Leavy of their young men, commanding his Prefiders to choose out three of the larger fab, he would make them valiant; mixing these among his own Companies, left being apart they should prove feditious, he trains them up with the same hardnes and severity of Discipline, threatening pain of Death on those who should fly from their Colours. Those who were not in arms he compell'd to be most part of the day in the Market-place; by which strange usage the Citizens borne and bred up in shameful Luxury were grievously perplexed, calling it a flavery to be thus serv'd against their wills, choosing rather to perish with idle mens and Lux. The offence was aggravat'd by the Insolence of some of the King's Guard who choosing Quarters at their own pleafure, possess'd them againft the will of their Landlords, using much licencé towards their Wives and Children. Wherefore many who were wearied out, forlook'd the City, and settled themselves in the Country, till at length that likewise was forbidden, the Ports being shut, and guards appointed. Then indeed the Tarentines perceiv'd that in head of a Companion they had got a Mafter, and what onely Comfort was left them, when they had any handfom occasion of meeting, they bewail'd their Condition with indignation and Complaints, and that more freely, when besides their other Paffion, they were heated with Winter there was not those who informed Pyrrhus of this, and some of them being sent for, were accus'd for having spoken dishonourably of their King at their Banquets: But one Man's simple and ingenuous Confession freed them all from Punishment, for fakes he, we fay'd these words indeed, and fhou'd have faid worse but that we wanted Wine; whereat Pyrrhus smiling, difmis them, being willing the fault should be imput'd to the wine rather than to the men; But not confiding either in the Minde or manners of the City, what men he observed to be of greatest Note for Authority or Counfell amongst them, he either found or made some Caufe arife to fend them to his Son Ptolemy (who being then fifteen years of Age he had left Viceroy in his Reigne) others by secret Ambush he cut off, and fome to make them fugifte'd to the People, he did with much seeming humanity, as if he held them amongst his dearest Friends. Of this number was Arifarchus a principal Man much beloved of the Citizens, and of great repute for his Eloquence, Pyrrhus perceiving him to be very Popular, upon a certain emergent Occasion commands him to faile into Epirus. Arifarchus (knowing it was present Death to disobey the King) and that to obey him was, though not of so fudden, yet of as certain ill Consequence) taking ship, after he had fail'd a little way, steer'd his course to Rome, where being received into credit, he inform'd the Senate of many Affairs of great Concernment: While Pyrrhus thus busied himself at Tarrentus, the Romans were no lefs careful in making Leav's for the warre, they had rais'd Money, and fent Fabrius to their Confederate Cities, either by his Authority or Grace to refrain them from Innovation in State: Those who were most fuppiet'd were kept in awe by Garrisons conveniently placed amongst them. For the strength of so many Nations combining themselves against one Commonwealth, and their expectation of so Warlike a King, had very much moved the humours of the Italians who were either diftrous of Change, or provoked with the perfwafion of Injuries receiv'd; which made the Romans the more diligent to provide for their own safety by a timely suppress'ing all Occasions of feditious Occasions. About this Time an Accident befell the Præfente Nobles very remarkable, for they being brought to Rome late in the Evening were for Custody's fake lock'd up in the Publick Treafury, whereby at length they understand the Deceit of an Oracle, which they did make ufes of to stir up their Countrymen to Rebellion, often averring, it was Decree'd by the Fates, That the Roman Treafury should be fupplied by the Præfente. The Fathers being already much perplexed, had further Intelligence that Fabrius was detain'd by their Confederate and Companions as a Pledge to fecure the fafe return of their hostages from Rome, and that Embaffadours were sent to incite the Etrurians, the Umbres and the Gauls againft the People of Rome; where at they were infinitely troubled as at a fact in it fole horrid, fo of ill Example, left in such a Dangerouf time the Roman faith and honestly should be call'd in question, and held fuppiet'd by, all all the Italians. In the utmost part of the Italian shore over against Sicilia is feared the City of Regium, (by a Grecian name so called) very wealthy and flourishing in those days: The Citizens thereof judging by the Arrival of Pyrrhus that a great and terrible warre were enuie, and frighted likewise with the Carthaginian Navy floating up and down in those seas, not trusting in their own strength, thought fit to send for a Guard from Rome. The Romans sent them Four thousand foildiers (which being leaved out of the Colonies of Campania, were call'd the Campanian Legion) under the Conduct of Decius jubellius their Colonel: Thefe at their first coming were very faithful, and very diligent in defending the City. At length seeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauc'd with idlenes and imitation of the Greek Customs, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much Covetouenefs and Envy did frequently discorsfe in all their meetings and quarters of the convenient Situation of the City, and the happiness of the Inhabitants. Decius was well pleas'd with this, who being himself grown as Licentious, had long ago conceived an inward desire of seizing upon the City. The design was favord'd by occasion of the present warre, which so wholly took up the Romans, that they had no Leisure to mind the affairs of Regium; Besides on the opposite shore were the Mamertines, An Example of the like successfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, especially being tyed with the Relation of the same Common Country; For they likewise were of Campania, and of late years going to warre amongst the Auxiliaries of Aegates, and being entertained by the Meffenians as Friends, having flain and caft out the Citizens, poss'd the place themselves: sharing likewise amongst themselves their houses, wives and Eftates. They called to mind also the Campanians of old, who by the like wicked art got Capi from the Tufcans. When they had now agreed upon the Busines, there was nothing left to be confulted on, but only the Manner, how safely to ex-cute their Design, left in fo populous a City, the leffer number should be surprized and flain by the greater.

Decius counterfeitt Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, to betray the Roman Garrison to him; these Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the fouldiers in private, Decius bitterly complaining of the Perfidiousnes of the Rhegians; and some fould-iers being refrub'd to it, cry out, 'Twas time to provide for their own Safety by the sword, and that Distraction which was design'd to them, upon the heads of the Authors; and as the busines was fet, a Medelenger comes in with newes, That Pyrrhus his Navy was seen by the shore, and secret discourses were had between him and the Rhegians.
The fouldiers now before their former Covetouenefs, were much incendied with the Treachery of the Enemy, and fear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Consent resolv'd upon, That the Townsmen shall be oppress'd unawares and unprepared, that having flain the Men, all the Publick and Private wealth of the City shall be disformt from the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decius having invited some of the Prime men to Supper, against the holy Rites of Hofpitality, takes away their Lives, others were every where flain in their own houfes; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murthered, the rest were banish'd their Country, even by those whom of late they had entertained under the Name of Friends and Companions, for prefervation of themselves and their Country. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affaires; the houfes and Eftates of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongst the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet fresh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to MARRY the murthers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to itfelfe the Title and Rights of the City of Regium. But it hath pleas'd God well to provide for Mankind, that fuch rare examples of high Mifchiefe should prove likewise as manifelt Exampathies of Vengeance and Divine Justice; Left we should onely by consideration of the success be animated to the like Villany, and not by the Iftue and event be deter'd from evil doing, so that no true Felicity attends the Wicked, neither can there be a greater Madnes, then for any man to perfwade himself that he can grow happy by doing Mifchiefe: For suppofe there were no Punishment after Death, which all wise men acknowledg to be the greatest, (for the folly of ordinary men is fo great they will scarce believe what is before their eyes, much lefs be moved with the terror of things unseen and affaire off,) yet let all things as to outward fwear fucceproperly, nevertheless the Confequence of offences committed doth by secret wounds continuously lacerate and torment the minde: The Name of the Living, and the memory of the Dead is had in perpetual hatred and Deltination among men: and what is by ill meanes gotten, and with care and labour prefervd is most commonly to their great Grief fallen away again, neither God nor men suffering Wickednes to go long unpunish'd. It will not be amifs briefly to relate the punishment of Decius jubellius, and his mad Accomplishes, as in these days it befell, for their Final destruction after great variety of troublefome Chances, was deferred to the Tenth year, as shall in fit time be declared. These Raccalls did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongst themselves: The fear of the Romans and Pyrrhus they did indeed avoid, as by reason of the present Conjuncture of Affaires, fo by holding strict society with the Mamertines, and relinquishing to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought safest in their first beginnings to abstain from warre at the present, while their New City which had so violent and sudden an Original, shou'd have time to strengthen, compact and knit it felle well together: they saw that without Danger they could not molest the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from the Romans, if they bore not arms against them. The first cause of dissension, as is usual among Thieves, arose from an unequal division of the Plunder. Decius in the sedition was cast out and betook himself to Messana, the Soldiers at Regium chose M. Cælius his Secretary for their Commander, and Decius carrying with him a great bank of money, was honour'd with the fame dignity by the Mamertines, though his fortune was neither prosperous nor of continuance, for it hapned, that being troubled with sore eyes, he caus'd some Eminent Physician to be sought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with most sharp and bitter punishments: A Physician was therefore brought unto him, who prov'd to be by birth a Rhægian, but because he had lived so long at Messana, his original was not only unknown to Decius, (who would never have trusted himself to the mercy of a Rhægian) but likewise to most of the inhabitants of the City.

He being mindful of his Country and resolving now to be revenged for its Calamities, prevailed Decius that the remedy he brought, was indeed strong in Operation, but of quick and most certain efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Cantharides, and giving order it should not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he tooketh this, and flyeth from Messana. Decius being along time sufficiently torment'd with incredible pains, seeing his Physician came not at him commanded the Medicament to be removed, which being washed off, he perceived himself to be farke blind. So that being now a blind Exil, infamous and dispi'd, he is refered to judgement, as if he were bound in Chains; by a wonderfull Method of Divine Vengeance, in that he received this Plague from one to whom he had trusted his health, even as he himselfe had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented those whom he ought to have protected. Tis fit such Examples as these should be recorded in History and transmitted to posterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never sufficiently convinced how farre their Cunning practices are different from widsome and right reason: So that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honesty, and Fidelity, they doe for love of false and onely seeming good things by foul and villanous huffs involve themselves in true Evils.

BOOK III.

OW at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a reserve against the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Consuls. P. Laevius Levinius was design'd against the Tarentines and Pyrrhus, and T. Cornelianus sent to finish the Etrurian War. Levinius, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, so to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them first; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth, to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortify a Castle in a convenient place, furnishing it with a strong Garrison, both to retard the proceedings of Pyrrhus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whose treachery was feared, lest they should dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman Consull's approach, though his forces were not yet assemmbled together, judging it both dishonourable and hurtful now in the beginning of the War to manifest any token of Fear, with what strength he had at present, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find some colourable pretence to draw out the business and gain time, he sent a Messenger with Letters of these Contents: Pyrrhus, the King wishest Health to Levinius, I understand that thou art come, forth forth with thine army against the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me With a small Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even those who are unwilling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Leontius answer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controversy, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou seem'st to do very absurdly in alluming to thyself the Judgment of other mens Causes, who are all self guilty of a Crime, and shall not as yet receive due punishment for entring Italy without our consent. Know then, that I come not against thee, but the Tarentines, to try our Right and Title with a just Army, by the Indemnity of Mars the Author and founder of our Nation. And without delay moving his Ensignes, he sits down between the Cities of Pandosia and Herculae, in a Champian ground, being divided from the Enemies Camp by the River Sirens.

'Tis reported that Pyrrhus, walking down to the River to view the Roman Camp, when he was well and diligently consider'd it, said to one of his friends, Megascles by name, These Barbarians have marshalled their Army after no barbarous manner, but we shall soon try what metal they are of. Then having placed strong guards upon the banke, to hinder their Passage through the Forde, he resolved to expect the coming of his Companions; not only for the Reaon of War, hoping the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of necessary accommodations, but as much regarding the spirit and confidence of Leontius, whose admiration was by a new Tephomine encrusted with him, in that he had freely without punishment diffused those Spies, which were sent to view his Campe, telling them more over. That he had another Army bigger then this. In the meantime the Camp being so near, there were many Pickeereings and light skirmishes which tended nothing to the main chance. Almost fifty days being now spent in these light skirmishes, the Consul being moved with the fame reasons to halfe the light, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, affemblying his Souldiers together, gave them to understand his Intentions, and encourag'd them against the fear of a new enemy, extemping, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrhus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himself for all affayes, he resolves either to fight the enemy by Conient, or compel him to Battel. Therefore seeing Pyrrhus still continue in his resolution, he fendeth out beforehand all his horse, as if to forrange the Country, himself with his Legions in Battel Array, expecting till the tumult and noise on the other side of the River should give them warning. The horse fetching a compass far from the Camps, crost the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemyes stations on that side the River: The Epirots terrify'd with their sudden approach, bestook themselves to their Camp. Pyrrhus understanding the enemy was so near, marcheth in all haste to the River with his whole body of horse, consitious of three thousand, hoping the Romans in their passage through a blind Ford, striving with the firemen and eveneens of the ground and breaking their orders, might there be vanquish'd. But the Roman horse interposing themselves, Pyrrhus riding at the head of his Troops, conspicuous in his flaming armor, of singular strength of Body and Resolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correspondent to his Fame and Reputation. He so exactly order'd the whole Battel with his Counsel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occasion serv'd, he would charge and fight in person, as if to him belonged only the Office of a Private Souldier, and that the care of the General issue were another man's business. In the mean time one Leonatus a Macedonian, having observed a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himself only against the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horse to whatsoever quarter he spied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who answer'd, No man can avoid the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, shall grapple with me without my reward, and due punishment. He had scarce spoken the words, when Oplacus (so was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frentian Troops) wounded the Kings horse with his Spear, Leonatus likewise wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round betteting him killed Oplacus, gloriously fighting for himself, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party, as believing him to be flaine: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewise to decline dangers intended against him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megascles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himself to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battel a long time fiercely continued with so doubtful success, that 'tis reported Fortune seven times changed, sometimes the Romans sometimes the Epirots turning their backs.

But the death of Megascles had like to have reduc'd Pyrrhus his affairs even to a most desperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was assaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of slaying the King: And at length an Horfeman, Dester by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his Helmet and Gorget, with loud cries carried them to the Conful, thereby ingenerating a belief in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Grecians were full of Terror and Consternation, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Field, but that Pyrrhus affoone as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voice witnessing, That he was a live, and present amongst them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as fear and Delaire from his own foiards. Leontius perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmost Remedy, gave the Signe to his Horfemen whom he had placed in Ambush, to fall upon the backe of the enemy. But Pyrrhus against this this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewise referred for the last Term- nior to the enemie. This one Contrivance daft't all the Romans hopes, and gave the Issue of the Battle clearly on Pyrrhus's side. For the men themselves being enlivened at the vast bulk of their bodies, and the terrible strew of armed Warriors on their backs thought they had rather seen some strange and formidable Monster, then the shape of any Creature by Nature produced; and as for the horse, they being straightforward with the sight, smell and noise of beasts they had never before seen, did forthwith, confounding their ranks, flee every one what way was most open; and either flaking off their riders, or against their wills forcing them to flight, they ran upon their own battal, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Reft of the Elephants following the perfuit, many of those that fled were wounded from those that flood in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beasts themselves. The Conful making use of his bell, did as yet keep his main battel together, still, by the command of Pyrrhus, the Theffalian wing being sent amongst them, did rout and scatter them, not being able to resist. And no question but in the place they were hem'd in, they had every man been slain or taken prisoners, but that, besides the Custom of Pyrrhus, who thought it not General like too severely to press upon those who fled, left by despair of safety they should be provoked to make more sharp resistence, the evening likewise being far spent compell'd them to relinquish the perfuit. Fortune likewise favour'd the remnant of the unfortunate Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with its braying confounded the reft. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to those that fled to crofs the River into Apulia, where they sheltered the melves in a fenced City against the preffent danger. I find that in this fight there were fourteen thousand eight hundred and seventy-five feet of the Romans and their friends slain, with two hundred and fourscore horfmen; there were taken in all eighteen hundred and twelve, in which number were eight hundred and two horfmen, there was lost likewise two and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why some Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were wanting on the Kings side, whereas Dionyfius writeth, that Livinus loft little leffe than fifteen Pincipall thousand, and that on the Victor's side thirteen thousand fell. But Hieronimus Cardianus, an impartial writer of those times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but few thousand, and of the Kings army under four thousand. But this is by all agreed on, That the Victory cost Pyrrhus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard to say, He was no less Conquer'd than Conqueror in that Battel. And when he offer'd the poopes and gifts to Jupiter of Tartessus, he confessed as much, inscribing that sentence in the Title, and when his friend complain'd, he replid, Of a truth, if I obtain such another Victory, I shall return one Epipus without e're a Souldier. I have likewise an Author that the King himself rec

To keep the bodies, they lifted themselves so fast, that presently they compleated the number of two Legions.
The Romans (who in their hardiest times had remitted nothing of their Confiancy), but as to the main issue of the warre always spake high; (as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a most fitting time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Aemilius Barbula for those exploits performed in his Consulship. He triumphed A. D. the fourth of the Ides of June, over the Tarentines, Sammites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order'd to draw the Remnant of his Conquer'd Army into the Setine fields, there to fortifie his Camp, and cause them to winter in their huts: About the same time the Senate disputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, resolved affirmatively: that which chiefly persuaded them, was I believe the Horsemens' Cafe, for they had stoutly maintained the fight during the absence of the Elephants, at whose approach the horse without any fault of the Riders yielded them up to Death, and to Bonds; upon this Errand were sent Embassadors of Principall Dignity, P. Cornelius Delabellus famous for his Defolation of Sena in Gallia; C. Fabricius Lusinus, and Q. Aemilius Populus, who two years since were Colleagues in the Consulship: Pyrrhus by Nature was Endow'd with humanity, the inexpressible Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encrease by his Ambition, according to the Vulturine Error, extolling all Virtues the servants to Domination, to which only being intertemperate fully, he did direct all his Counsells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferior to any Commander of that Age in Boldness of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all means before he came to Blows; he would folicit the mind of his Enemy as he law most opponnent with Fear, or Desire, or Pleasure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Condition. Therefore understanding Embassadors were coming from Rome, and judging so many Confiar men were not sent, but upon some Grand Affairs, he was in good hopes they would treat of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their access might be the safer and the more honourable, he sent Lys. (by nation a Molopitan) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himself on Horseback with rich Caparisons met them without the Gates. And having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Respect, liberality and plenty that might be.

They premising somewhat tending to Moderation of the mind, as how great the Inconvenience of Fortifiing is, how fatal the Changes of Warre, and that future Contingents cannot be foreseen, deliver their Message, That they came to receive their Captives, whether he would suffer them at a Certain price to be redeemed, or to be exchanged for Tarentines and others. Pyrrhus whose Culfom it was, not to tranfient any thing of moment without advice of his friends, convened them now together; and Miltiades Opinion was, That he should detain the Captives, make use of his fortune, and not cast the Warre till he had thoughtfully submit to the Romans; Given his Counsell was very different, for, speaking of the Confiency of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had often shown even in the hardest times to be invincible, he added moreover, As for other Enemies it is likely we may hate their manners or contempte their Armes, but with this Nation, O King, it is better making Friendship than warre, and it's convenient not only to return the Captives, but freely to dismiss them without Restorse; Neither is any delay to be made, but that you send back the Embassadors with Prellims, to conclude Peace upon equal Terms: For this I take to be the time, wherein with honour and Credit you may accomplish a Business (in my judgement) very necessary. For now your affairs having succeeded properly, you shall both more easily by Treaty obtain what you desire, and likewise seem for no other Canse but the same Greatnes and Goodnes of your mind, to offer Peace unto those whom you might by force have reduced into Slavery. And farre be it from Thee, but that They Disreare should proaper as they have begun, Yet We are but Men, and it Fortune change her side, neiter will it be easie a matser to Obtaine Peace, neither can it is with so much honour be treated on. When the reft a-greed in the fame Opinion, the King himselfe likewise assenting, commanded the Romans Em- Dce spud baffauidors to be called, to whom he spake in this Manner; Tenr Errand, Romans, seemeth to the Fur, Anfians, me very unnorfully, for having no Consideration of entering into Friendship With me, you require back the Prinse of Warre, whom being refufterd, you are ready presently to make use of againft me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counsell, beneficall to both Parties, and make a League and Society with me, I will resolve all your Citizens and Companions in Armes without price or Random; otherwise if you continue hostility, I shall think it no wise part, to strengthen your Hatred against me with the hands of so many Valiant men. Neither is Money so fastible with me as to need any from the Romans which it would better become, if we were Friends, to be enriched by my bounty; Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Emba- baffators, with promise he would bestow more and of greater Price. These things were spoken and Acted openly in the Presence of all the Embabilidades. But with c. Fabri'c'ius he had for- warded a longer and more serious discourse. Neither shall I think it unfit to relate what I find in good Authors. When therfore they had speech together in secret without witnesses, among other things 'us reported the King said thus: My desir is to have all the Romans my Friends, but especially your selfe, whom I esteem above all others, as moft eminent in Civil and Military virtues, onely one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having so flender substance you are not able to maintaine that Port and Splendour which justly attends Great men, as their Due: But I will not suffer you any longer to be fensible of this Injury, and dispise of Fortune, I will freely bestow so large a summe of Gold and Silver, as you shall easie exceed the Reve- nues of the Richell. For I am persuaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the hard Wants of Worthy men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory than Wealth: Truely I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more illustrious monument of Kings Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto the Gods: so that I shall rather think you do me a Courtefie, then receive one at my hands, if you will suffer your selfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truly would I urge this to you if on my side onely the Bounty should seeme Glorious, on your side the Acceptance dishonour- able. But now I tempe you not to Treafon or the commissiion of any Fact misbecom- ming your Grave Manners; what Reason is there why you should with a refolute and obinate mind refuse a small Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I desire nothing of you, but, what may, of duty ought to be done by the beft of Men. and most tender of their Countries Good, that you would perwave the Senate to forlakhe their willful stubborness, and recall their minds to Equity and milder Counsell, giving them to understand the Truth; that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Lofs and Danger, neither can I (having promised help to the Tarentines, and proved victor in the first Battell) without manifeft breach of faith, and diminution of mine Honour relinquisht it. Neither indeed do I delight in fighting with you whom I judge fa'rite more worthy my Friendship then my Hatred, and had much rather return home into mine own Kingdom, where many bunifhes in the inte- rim arife, which require my presence. And for this I will give you what assurance you shall de- fire, whereby you may be satisfied concerning my Intentions, and resolve the Doubts of o- thers; if any shall think it not safe to tru't to Kings, by reason of the fault of some, who, hanging to their Agreements and Covenants so long onely as it seemeth for their Profit, when they perceive any benefit to be gain'd by Change, have chos'en rather to break their Faith then lose an Advantage. And when the Peace shall be concluded, there is nothing will please me better, or be more commodious to us both, then that you would bear me company into Epirus, where you shall have the Principal place among my Subjects, be my Lieutenant in Warre, and Partner of all my Fortunes. For I esteem no Poffession more precious then that of a Valiant and Faithfull Friend, and certainly the splendour of a Kingly Fortune, and the Majesty of Roy- al affaires will well become your great Mind. Thefe things if we shall in Common conferre, mutually helping one the other, we shall without any difficulty attaine to the greatest Happinenss that man is capable of or can imagine.

When the King had thus made an end of speaking, after a little distance Fabricius anwer'd, Concerning my Vice, if any could be observ'd either in my military or Civill employments, it is needefls for me to disserte seeing you have already trusted the Relation of others concerning it. Neither is it necessary to declare my poverty, that being the matter of a little ground and a small Cottage, I maintaine my self neither by industry nor the sweat of servants, but by the labour and exercitie of my owne Body, seeing this also you have truly learnt by the dis- course of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, you judge me, by reason of my poverty, to be in worse condition then any other Roman, you are wonderfully deceived. For defpiling Riches, embracing Virtue, and doing my duty,

I was never sensible of any misery; neither in private or public usefulness did I ever repine at my Fortune. For what Reason have I to speake ill of fortune, unleffe I should impute it as a crime to her, that I enjoy all those things which to greate and high spirits are most desirables, not only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest honours our country affordeth: The heaviest wars are committed to my Charge; I am entreated with the care of our most holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked concerning the most weighty affairs, I am commended and cheerfully imitated by many; neither am I of less esteem then the most potent man in the City; I seem unto others an example and pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this befalling no cost either of mine own or others. For in other places, where particular mens wealth is greatest, and the publick flock but small, the Magistrates sustain the dignity and splendor of their office by their own expense.

In our City the outforme is much different, no private mans fortune being on any side burdensome. All this great and glorious poms, wherewith our Citizens, who are chosen to the administration of grand affairs, are so magnificently set forth, is of publick allowance; which order maketh all men equal, so that the poorest man shall want nothing for the mainaining either the publick or his own grace, neither shall the richest in anything abound. Wherefore seeing, though I am the poorest of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richest of all;

why should I complain of Fortune? should I desire to be equal with Kings, who may hoard up vast sums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have spoken in reference to my life in Publick, even in private also my indigence is so far from being a burden or inconvenience to me, that contrariwise, as often as I compare my self with the rich ones, my condition seemeth incomparably more happy, and I reckon my self among those few who have attained to so much Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mildly rejoice and give thanks to my Poverty. For it seeming to me idle and foolish to pursue after things superfluous, and that my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yeldeth all necessaries; I know not what end I should be solicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes sweet to me, and thirft my Drink; after labour my sleep is easy and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from cold, are of proof sufficient; and my household stuff, according as it is apt and fit for those ues it was ordain'd to, so it very well pleaseth me. So that herein also I should be injurious to accuse Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger substance then nature defires, which hath neither ingenerated in me a covetousnes of what is too much, nor a dexterity of scrapping it together. Wherefore with this my poverty I judge myself more wealthy then the richest men, yea, then thy self also; for I have so much that I desire no more, whereas useless you thought your self poor notwithstanding your possession of Epirus, and all other your Territories, why came you over into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair opportunity of doing good to mankind, and that I am my poverty can be bountiful to no body. Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things also I do not abound: That the gods have not endowed me with knowledge superbly excellent, and the Art of Prophecying and many other the like things, whereby I might benefit those who in these kinds want help. But if I freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens those things which are in my power, and suffer every one in common to partake of what may any way pleasure them, I shall think my self free from that crime of being useless or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I have you esteem those things small and contemptible, because others seem greater in your eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes. But, if for supplying the necessities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be desired, and that in this respect the possession of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings seem to be perverted; which think you, were the better way of purchasing wealth, that I should now with disgrace receive it at your hands, or that I should, when it was in my power, have long agoe gather'd it upon most honest accounts? For my prosperous management of Publick affairs, hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich; as often at other times, so especially when four years since, being Conful, and west with an army against the Samnites, Lucianians and Brutiens I overcame those large and fertile Territories westing and spoiling, when being conqueror in many Battles, I took by force and demolish'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Souldiers being largely rewarded, and all debts paid which the Commonwealth had contracted with private men for carrying on the War, there was yet so much remaining that I carried into the Publick Treasury four hundred Talents. Now after I have scorn'd to acquire just and honest Riches by those spoils which I were in my hands, and by the example of Eustis Publicola (and others who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before mony, shall I receive gifts of thee, and embrace shameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neglected a fair and honourable mean? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleasure, and good conscience have expended in just and honest ues, which I receive of you I cannot do: For that money is rather to be accounted lent then beower'd which proceeds from another's bounty, and however it be given and received under the specious pretence of hospitality, friendship or good will, 'tis burthenome to an Ingenious and high Spirit till it be reformed. And what do you think will be the issue of this business when it is known (as conceiv'd it cannot be) if the Cenitours, who with ample authority exercise the superintendence of Manners amongst us, shall (according to that power wherewith they are invested to enquire into the Lives of the Citizens, and punishe those who deviate from the Institutions of our Fathers) publicly summon me to give an account of the reasons, why I received any Gifts from thee?

Many
Many report that Pyrrhus, resolving at any rate to win a man of such excellent vertue, did yet more extremely tempt his Constancy, and after other magnificent promises, making a prof- fer of half his Kingdom could not therewith move him, but that till he perswaded to deny the Ac- complishment of the Kings desires, For, saies he, if I am an evil man, why do you court me? If good, why would you corrupt me? adding moreover, That this benefice would prove neither pleasing nor profitable to Pyrrhus if it should succeed, for if he should make use of his liberty, he would be hazzard both for the King and his Friends, as for his Juicice and Althentic, if the Epis- ruts once had experience of them, they would forsake the King and apply themselves rather to him, These things, and what hereafter I shall add, being by various Authors related, I thought nei- ther inconvenient nor unprofitable to collect and declare, that the mind and sense of those men may be known, who supported the Roman State in most difficult times, and improv'd so to that incomparable height of Glory and Empire it attain'd to: and that by a clear example it may be apprehended, what Virtues and Manners ought to be practis'd by those men, who would become objects of Admiration, and transmirt to their posterity a more flourishing Common- wealth then they received from their Ancestours. These things being spoken and heard on both sides, the King at present contented himself, but on the morrow, caus'ing Fabricius to be for- fe for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who standing at their backs behind the hangings, as they were discoursing, the hangings being on a sudden withdrawn, at the Malters command laid his fnout on Fabricius his head, making a molt horrid noise; but he, being a man of a sedtied spirit, gravely turning himself about, smiled, saying, Neither yesterday did your gold entice me, nor to day your beast terrify me. Afterwards being fett at supper, when he heard Cicero discoursing of the Grecian Philosophers of the Sell of Epicurus, that they esteemed Plea- sure the greatest good, and the cares of the Commonwealth the chiefest hindrance of Felicity: That the gods in their opinion led such a life free from the care of humane affairs, free from all afliances either of anger against the wicked, or favour to the good, giving themselves over wholly to idlenes and pleasures: Fabricius thereupon is faid to cry out, The gods grant that Pyrrhus and Val Maximus, the Sammites would practice this wisdom while they wage war with the people of Rome. These were the manneres of those times, this was the Emulation of great men, to excel not in wealth or Luxury, but in Virtue, in Counsel, in Patience, in the Love of their Country. Neither were these sudden Motions and fets, or speeches premeditated out of hypocrisy for the present occasion, but they did confirm the faith of their words by the constant Tenour of their Lives, whereby they are rather to be admired then imitated by our Age. The same Fabricius when all his silver plate confi'd of one Safe-cellar and a little ditt, which yet was falfin by an horning floor, the Sammite Embassadors prefenting him with a gift of money and very rich houfhold stuff, let his hands to his ears, thence to his eyes, nose, mouth, throat, and at length to his belly, saying, As long as I can command these, nothing shall be wanting to me, carry ye back your money to those who fland in need of it. After the fame manner he spent his whole life, infomuch as in all his Patrimony there was not fufficient whereby to raise Portions for his Daughters (an Honourable poverty) so that the Senate caufed money for that purpofe to be disbursed out of the Publick Treasury, being affhamed to let thofe Virgins paife without Dowry, whose Father was not affhamed to leave fo. The fame vertue and continence was found in other Princes of the Senate; among the reft Q. Fabius who had often been in Chiefie command, and having once borne the Cenforship denied to be made Cenfor againe, faying, It was not for the good of the Commonwealth, that the illift. The fame men should often be chosen Cenfor; he died with the fame fatisfaction both of his poverty, and the peoples Love, for after his Death they beleev'd fo much money that his fon Gurgis did felloe a dole of fefh upon the people, & likewise made a publick Feast. Curious out of the fame gallantry of mind refu'd the gifts of the Sabines as Fabricius did the Sammites; Emilio Papus, Gemon in Lelio who was in moft offices Colleagues with Fabricius, alfo Trib. Coranicus, and many other men of great note, by reason of their likenefs in manners, lived together in great love and friendship: So that the Poet seems to me to have conceived in his mind the Idea of those times, when he faid, The Roman State was upheld by men and manners of the old Roman. Pyrrhus Dei. 1. 11. seriously considering and pondering these things, was inflam'd with a great defire of compofing all differences with this Nation, and immediately returned two hundred of the Captives without ransom, and gave leave likewise to all the reft to go to Rome and visit their friends at the Feast of Saturn now approaching, relying only on the word of Fabricius, who promised, That when the Holy-days were past they should return, unless peace were in the mean time concluded. And such was the Gravity of the Senate, and the fidelity of every fingle Perfon, that at a Day by the Fathers appointed, they every man redelivered themselves up to Pyrrhus, having in vain urged their Country-men obfolute minds to Articles of Peace. For the Crafty King, Eteur 1. 18. 34 thinking this to be a nick of time for his purpofe, while the Romans being mollified with the fight of their dearest friends, and defirous of retaining them, might happily be the more ready to lay down all thoughts of hatred and hostility, resolved now to fend an Embaffege to Rome to Treat of Peace on those Conditions he had propo£d to Fabricius in Perfon. He defir'd the Tarentines might be comprehended in the League, That the other Grecians inhab. 18. 32 bis ing Italy might continue free, living according to their own Laws: That whatsoever the Allies Romans

Roman had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Bruttians might be restored; and in Locris, the Romans should receive their Captives without Restrain. Cines of whom mention hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyrrhus, a man as of great knowledge in Civil Affairs, so of very honest Principles, and who had by exercise improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For these his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged, He had won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cines, then by his own Arms. This man being sent Embassador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his address to the Senate, till he had in Pyrrhus his name distributed many gifts in the houses of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, Extend the virtue of Pyrrhus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he discoursed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, infomuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them: because besides other conveniences, he promised, if they should deflect molesting his friends, he would furnish them with aid sufficient for the Conquest of all the rest of Italy. But, because the Consulification lasted many days ( the Fathers being very solicitous in a business of so great consequence) and thereby a suspicion and rumor was spread, that peace would be concluded, Appius Claudius, who by reason of his Age and blindhness, had of a long time been absent from the Senate, caus'd himself now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no sooner appeared, but his sons and sons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. Every one being silent both at the novelty of the thing, and with the respect they bore his person, and expecting for what cause, after so long absence and retirement; he should now come into the Senate: he beginning his discourse with the affection of his sickenes, said, His Blindness had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now he was not only delighted in it, left he should behold those things which were doing, but was sorry that his cares also were not deaf; that he might not hear things so forfard and unwor:' thy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whether are your spirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his Fortune then his Virtue; that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event, and likewise his eleemos amongst men would have proved far different. But now, behold how ye are degenerated from that your Magnanimity ye once thought ye were able to conquer the Macedonians, and now ye stand in fear of Molossians and Chonians, the perpetual prey of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frighted by Pyrrhus, not the servant of Alexander, but his servants servant, who flying from his old enemies rather then seeking new, is come over into Italy with a resolution, shoul'd it please the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with those forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his little share of Macedonia. Unless therefore we send him back well beaten, laden with great misfortune, affure your selves, any other Party, defferently flying and forsuing our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can be thought of, but that we are a cowardly flotful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into friendship, shall carry back a Reward for that Disgrace he hath done us, in as much as his 'means it is come to pafs that the Romans are become a Laughing-Rock to the Tarentines and 'Sammites.

This was the main scope of Appius his Oration, which did so inflame the minds of all the Senators, that, following him the Author of a severe Sentence, they with one consent decreed, That the War should be profoeced, that Cines should the same day depart the City, that Pyrrhus should be given to understand, That neither should he be admitted into the City, (for that also was desired) would they so much as treat of friendship and society, till he had quittd Italy. Alike by that decree by Appius his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they should not be led in War against Pyrrhus, neither should they any where be joined in the same company, but that being sent to several Garrisons, they should, as a nation of slaves, change their manner of living, that they who before lived on horse-back, should now be lifted among the feet, and they who were of the Legions, should now serve in light armature. That no man should recover his former order, till he had brought in the spoil of two enemies. 'Tis reported, when the Embassadors returned with this sharp answer, the King almonist in the wonderful confanty of the Romans, asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cines answer'd, The City seemed to be a Temple of the gods, and the Senate an Assembly of Kings.

After these Transactions, some think, Fabricius was sent an Embassador to the King: but they are easily convinced of Etour as by the Testimony of other Authors, so by a right Consideration of the Series of Affairs. There being now no hopes of peace, they converted all their thoughts to War, and built themselves on both sides all winter in making diligent preparations. These I take to be the Times wherein Pyrrhus is reported, for the avoiding the Dangers of thrift-wrack, and a more convenient passage of the Italian and Epirus Succours one to the other) to have had thoughts of making Bridges between Hydrains, where Italy gets farthel into the sea, and Apollonia, a Town situate on the adverse shore, some fifty miles distant: For that is the Bredth of the Sea in those places between the Gracian and Italian shoares. M. Tertius Varro is said afterward to have made the like Attempt, when, being Cn. Magnus his Lieuent

In the war against the Pirates, he guarded the Sicilian and Ionian seas with his Navy.

In the midst of these doings Tib. Cornelius, the Consul Triumphant A. D. of the Calends of February. This year was a remarkable Centurion in that a Lustration of the army was then first made by one of a Plebian flock. There were cossed two hundred seventy-eight thousand, two hundred twenty-two Citizens. About these times it was that Q. Fabius Maximus was to be chosen Prince of the Senate; and by conjecture we gather, his son Q. C. Garus was his army at that Time. Cn. Domitius certainly was, for he stultified the Army, and his name is famous for enlarging the Privilages of the People. Pyrrhus in the beginning of the spring, calling together the Forces of his Confederates, marched into Apulia, where he took many Townes, some by Force, some by Composition. Against whom the two new Consuls P. Silpius Scaevus, and P. Decius Maius went forth with two Armies pitching Camp against Camp, near Asculum a City of Apulia, of the fame name with that City of the Picenter. No doubt was made of Fighting, but they were many days hindred as by a deep Torrent running between them, so by mutual fear on each side. The Romans were troubled with remembrance of the former Battell wherein Pyrrhus was victorious; The Epriots were daunted at the Roman obstinacy, but chiefly at the name of the other Consull, so to fall to the Enemies

Legions. For it was given out that P. Decius after the Example of his Father and Grandfather would purchase the Victory with his Death; and the issue of those Battells wherein they died, did make the expectation of the Decius Devotion to be terrible to all men.

Pyrrhus thinking it a matter not to be neglected, assembling his foullidiers together, Thus instructed them. That the Event of Battels was not in the Power either of the Goddes Earth, or of the Infernal Deities, who were invoked by that Charme, that they ought not to believe the Gods to be so unjust as to alter the fates of the Gods, and bellow conquests for one mad-man's sake; that victories are not obtained by jugling tricks, and superstitition, but by fighting only; as appears by the Testimony of the Romans themselves, who come not into the field with troops of Priests and Prophets, but with Legions of armed foullidiers to oppose the Enemy: But because the ignorant are commonly more terriified with these superfluous delusions, then with true caules of feare, he shewed that this feare might be prevented, by shewing the Habit wherein the former Decius had Devored themselves, and warning the foulidiers if they met any Man in the like accomtrement not to affult him with any weapon, but to take him alive. He caused likewise a Message be sent to Decius. That he should forbear playing the fool amongst armed men, neither should his Plots take Effect, that if he came alive into his hands he should perhaps endure more torments then he was willing. Thus answer'd he the Confuls. They had Confidence enough in their Army; neither had any need of so disasterous a Design, which that he might be assured of, they gave him his Choice, whether he would come over the River interjacent; or Expeulf the Romans on his side the water; that they would willingly withdraw their forces to give him a safe passage over, or if he would retire, they would bring over their men, that on each side encouaging with their strength more, demonstration might be made, that they repose all their hopes of victory in their men, and their Courage, and in no other thing: Pyrrhus was affmmed of betraying any kind of fear or Doubt; he accepted thereof the latter Condition and gave the Enemy Liberty of foording the River. The Terroure of the Elephants was not now so great to the Romans, as being accustomed to see them, so having had Experience that their fions might eaily be cut off, as one was in the last fight at one blow by C. Minucius the foremost Mukeman of the Fourth Legion. But now they bethought themselves of later guards and Defences; They cauasd horses cloathed with Iron plates to draw Chariots, which were likewise full phat with spears fastned in Iron foackets;

the Chariots were placed so allidiers who with darts or fire should avert the fury of the Elephants. The Legions with this furniture having pass'd the River, Pyrrhus in a singular and Excellent manner martial'd his Army, according to his Cufion wherein he was thought to exceed all Commanders of his Time. Obeying therefore the Nature of the place, which by reason of the Ruggedness of the Ground, and the multitude of Oiers thereabouts growing would well admit of a foot Army onely; he placed his horse and Elephants in the Referve. The Right wing he strengthen'd with his own foullidiers and the Sainmte Auxiliaries, The Brutasian Lucianans and Salentins he placed in the midde, the Tarentines, whose virtue he leaft confidid in, he order'd in the midde. The Conful's main body confidid of their Legions, some of the light Armature being conveniently intermixt, and with the like Difcretion they dlignified the Orders of their Referves. The horse were distributed into the Wings, being no hindrance to the Foot fight; and yet upon occasion offered, ready for Action. The Armies being equal, not only in Courage but: in number ( for they were forty thousand strong on both sides) disputed the business with as much heat and animony as could be expected, and the Victory uncning to neither side, the night broke off the Fight. The next Morining Pyrrhus when he had guarded the most difficult places, forced the Romans to defend into a more even and open ground; there he had some use of his Elephants, which being suddenly brought into that part of the Battell where the Chariots were prepared against them, they frighted the horse (even as it happen'd in the last figh) and cauasd them to fly; but to the Foot they did little harme. The Report of this Fight is much different from that of the former, for some Authors affirm, The Ro-

Plutarch

The Romans had the upper hand, their victory being occasion'd by an accident, for the Apulians (who were by the Kings Order sent against those who came to surprise the carriage) by their departure seeming to fly, by a mere error and false fear could all the Kings forces to quit the field and fly instead. The number of the slain is likewise expressed, That on Pyrrhus his side twenty thousand, on the Romans side five thousand were Wounding, that the King with a dark shot through his side was grievously wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to say the flight of his men, was by his Life-guard brought out of the field one of the left, that on his side three and fifty colours were left, on the Romans eleven, and that the fabricius the other Consuls Lieutenant was likewise wounded. But contrariwise, others say, This Battel had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reason of the vicinity of their Camps sustained not so much loss, but that they did conselusally fly, and left six thousand, and men that Pyrrhus left three thousand five hundred and five, as is in the Kings Chronicles registed by the Testimony of Hieronimus.

And not only variety but Repugnancy of Authors serves me rather to incline to those who report the event of this Battel to have been doubtful for 'tis ordinary after an equal encounter for each part to contribute the victroy to themselves, which by the negligence or Impudence of others is committed to writing, Doing very ill to deliver to posterity for true and undoubted, those things which are grounded on idle report only, or for affection are partially related. Wherefore their history feemes more probable who affirms, That there was but one Fight were Aculum, and that, after an hot dispute and much blood shed, the Sun being now set, the Kings wound and the life of the Baggage did with much ado break off the fight: That then both Armies founded a Retreat, when on both sides there were slain about fifteen thousand, and that this was the time when Pyrrhus answer'd out who congratulated his victroy, If the Romans are to be vanquish'd we are undone our selves. And indeed the sequel confirms this Opinion, for Pyrrhus retired to Tarentus, and the Consuls, making no pursuit after the enemy, distributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulia, whereas the time of yeare gave them leave, and Reafons of War might well have perfwaded them, to have profecced so glorious a victroy. Moreover I find not that these Consuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decius in this Battel devoted himselfe, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himselfe the Third facrice, without intermission out of the fame family, for the good of the Common-wealth. Which as I had no thoughts to gain-fay, So should I not have related in the general silence of all Histories, but that a grave Author M. Tullius Cicero in his bookes of Phylophony more then once make mention of it. The fight at Aculum thus ended, the rest of the yeare was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time spent in Conflagration and preparations. Pyrrhus, having left molt of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, sent into Epirus with order for a supply of Men and money for next yeare. But before that Nation could be set forth, new hopes arising alter'd the Kings Counsells. Pyrrhus had sometime the profession of Macedonia, welling it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again to't by the Power of Lysmachus, Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy, Phocion Cassius being slain by the Gauls, there seemed a new wave of invasion into Macedonia, being deluitive of a Prince and the slate of affairs in Confusion. This Reason persuaded him not to leave Epirus naked of soldiers, lest it should be obnoxious to the injuries of the Gauls who now opprest the Neibour nation on Macedon: But Pyrrhus did not as then there his Oourse homeward, being upon other Occasions (as shall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being past over in these Cares the New Consuls came to the Army C. Fabricius Lucius, and Q. Emilinus Papus (who before had born a Consulschip together) which Pyrrhus understanding drew forth his forces, intending to obverse the Marches and Counsels of his enemy. Their Camps being not far distant, there happen'd an Accident very remarkable, and by most men related much after the same manner, One Timochares an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings favour, secretly came to Fabricius, and promised him, if he would give him an answerable reward, to Poyfon the King; which he thought was easy for him to accomplish by his sons, who were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius; no way delighted with the Trefon, informed the Senate of it. The Senate not discovering the Trefon of Timochares, who had (by what means ever) intended the Roman profit, sent Embassadors to Pyrrhus, who should only in general warn him, That he should look well about him, and take heed of what mens service he made use of, and engage into their faithfulness and honesty. Thus Fabricius Anius relates the busines. But Claudius Quadrarius in stead of Timochares make Nicer the undertaker of this Poyfoning, and that notice was given not only by the Senate but by the Consuls, reciting also the Letter of the Consuls, wherein they discover Nicer's design, That they are unwilling to signe by craft, or with money, and with the King safe from Trefon, hoping he will become an Illuminns Ornument to their victroy and Triumphs.

Some Report it was the Kings Physician who treated with Fabricius either in person or by Letter, and that upon his discovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in these Circumstances, so no question they are deceived who say that Curius sent the Physician to the King. Tis said that Pyrrhus at this time wonder'd at the experience of so great Vertue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no little difficulty foresee from the Rules of Physic and Honesty, then the Sun be turn'd out of his Counsels. He did immediately, left he should be Overcome with Kindneffe, return the Romans all the prisoners he had, and sent Curius again.

to obtain peace and friendship. It seemed dishonourable to receive a gift from the enemy, where- by they might be thought to have abhorred wickedness more for gain then for the love of Ver-tue, they therefore sent back an equal number of Tarentines and Sammites that their captives might not be received gratis. This publick abstinence was to their greater Credit seconded by the verite and resolution of private persons, when the gifts of Pyrrhus (which Cicero in Great Number and those very precious had Carried to Rome for both sexes) were refused not only by the Men but by the women. For when upon the refusal of some, he professed to others, and others again, there was not so much as one man or woman to be found to mean courageous to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The Former answer was now again returned to the Embassadors, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would esteem him an Enemy to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at these passages, not knowing how to prosecute the War with any cheerfulness, nor willing to depart Italy with any loss of Reputation, the Sicilian affaires did seem to him, the management whereof (after long and doubtful deliberation) he resolved to undertake. For so he thought the Roman war might with credit be declined, and the command of a most Rich Island, obtained, he had also an earnest desire of being revenged on the Carthaginians, as being first provoked by them. For to suspicute the Kings designes had a little before hand lent Magos with a Navy of hundred and twenty ships, laying, The Romans ought by Foreign aid to be effsied against a foreign enemy. And though the Romans united not their affilience, making answer, That they were not wont to undertake any War but what could be managed by their own forces; Yet now this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths.

To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be specially excepted, that they might affit one the other, which forever of them were provoked to war; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthaginians should provide ships, each party pay their own soldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans by sea, but not be compelled against their wills out of their ships. Which being agreed upon, Magos went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to discover the Kings Councils, whom the Carthaginians had understood to be invited into Sicily: And they offerd their Navy to the Romans not to much out of any good will or care of their safety, but further to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, let he should spoil their successe in Sicily which flour ished to prosperably. They had then also guarded the passage into Sicily with a numerous flote, pretending the siege of Rhegium, but indeed resolving to hinder Pyrrhus from transmitting his Army. For these causes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affaires, which fill ated him with great hope, as by the state of things, so by the frequent Embassies which came one after another out of the Island, affirmed, That he was desired by the prayers of all men, as the only remedy of their calamities wherein they were more sharply afflicted than the most miserable Nation under the heavens. For after the death of Alcmaeon, more lamentable than undefend ed, one Meno, born at Agrigentum, a City of Sicily, who had poison'd the King, endeavouring to usurp the government, was by Hiero the Prior expelled the City, and fled to the Carthaginian forces: Hence arose an heavy war and unfortunate to the Syracusians, by which never the less Hiero, in particular strengthened himself, and turning his forces against Priestises of Agrigentum, he held the Island long time in trouble, till by the boldness of one Themo he was deprived of his Domination which he had held for nine years. Themo endeavouring to re tain the Sovereignty, was refilid by Sosistratus a Syracusan Nobleman. These two along time contended, Themo poising in Naxus, an Island which is part of Syracuse, Sosistratus exercising the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by those discords they faw nothing but destruction likely to ensue, with one content they decreed to fend for Pyrr hus, who being the son in law of Alcmaeon, and next in succession, as having a son by Laurence, was thought fittest to bear rule, as being able by his courage and his forces to settle their affaires. Moreover, the principal men of Agrigentum and Locuntum, offering the Go vernment of their Cities, and consequently of the whole Island, unanimously intreated him
To come into Sicily as soon as may be, to receive them with his presence, being wearied with lab houring under the heavy burden of an Barbarous slavery. For the Carthaginians having wasted their grounds, had befriend the City of Syracuse, both by sea and land, with a Navy of an hundred ships, and an Army of fifty thousand men. Pyrrhus therefore without delay lenthed Cinius before (whole wisdom and faith he much trusted to) to agree upon Conditions and Articles of friendship with the Sicilian Cities. At his departure he comforted his Italian con federates, promising, That if they were opprest by the Romans he would in speed come out of the neighbour Island much encroached with new forces. But when he was about to leave a Gar son in Tarentum, they taking it in ill part, desir'd, He would either perform his promised affi lance on those conditions he was call'd on, or that at least he would leave their City free. They could obtain neither, Pyrrhus returning no other answer, but commanding them, To carry his lesire. The Epyt King being thus employ'd, the Confuls had the easier war against their other enemies. I find they had about this time good successe against the Etrurians, Lucians, Brutians and Sammites. It appears there was not great matter done against the Etrurians, in that there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engaged, who re-infused against the Romans those arms they had so lately laid down, being solicited by the Sammites, who found themselves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhus. Among the other

other nations as the war was more heavy, so was the Victory more illustrious over them. C. Fabricius the Consul (his Colleague, as is imagined, being gone into Etruria, inasmuch as upon the Epirots departure one Consular Army was thought sufficient) overcame the Lucaniens, Brutians, Tarentines and Samnites: Some Cities, among which were Heraclea, he drew into Covenants, and over those people he triumphed before the Ides of December.

An Assembly of the people being held, new Consuls were chosen for the year ensuing, P. Cornelius Rufius again, and C. Fabius Brutus again. Other Nobles were Candidates with Rufius, but by Fabricius his favour he was chosen. Wherein Fabricius considering the times, prefer'd the publick safety before private quarrels; For by reason of their difference in Manners there was Enmity between them two, Fabricius being of proofe against Mony was guided only by his care of the common good; Rufius more greedy of wealth than ordinary, many times order'd his counsels and actions to his private gain. But being otherwise Industrious and a good Commander, Fabricius judged him to be prefer'd before his Competitors who were far inferior to him in Martial affairs. 'Tis reported, when Rufius gave him thanks, Cicero de O. that being at enmity with him he had help'd him to the Consulship, especially when so great a War was on foot; he answer'd, 'Twas not much to be wonder'd, if he had rather be pifi'd, then sold to the enemy. For there was great War remaining in Italy, and Pyrrhus finding all things goe according to his desire in Sicily (whether he now was gone) 'twas reasonably fear'd he would quickly return a more formidable enemy by the Acte of the Strength of so Noble an Island.

BOOK IV.

H I L E these things were doing in Italy, Pyrrhus having shipp'd his Army and Elephants, failed from the Tarentine Fort into Sicily, after he had continu'd two years and four months in Italy. Being conducted by Theneus, who met him with his Navy, he was receiv'd by the Sicilians with wonderful cheerfulness, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Money and their Ships. Being thus in a short time possesse of the dominion of the Grecian Cities, he did also by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatsoever he held, excepting only the City of Lilybaum, which the Carthaginians being help'd by its convenient situation, defend'd against all his assailes. Whence justly conceiving great and vast hopes in his mind, he resolved, leaving his eldest Son the Patrimony of his Father, to settle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years sustaine'd both foreign and civil wars, and a plague worse then both, the tyranny of usurpers, seem'd willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raise moneys against their wills, and put to death some of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreased by the covetousnes and arrogance of his Officers, whose vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the first and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themselves Egregiously good, 'tis for their honour and safety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, seeing private men are blamed only for their own faults, but other men's crimes are imputed to Princes. But these things things hapned afterwards. Now at Present, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the highest Honour and magnificence received, first by Tymarian Prince of the Tauronimitians (for in that part of the Iland he landed) then by the People of Catanea, and so passed with his foot-Army to Syracuse: His fleet he commanded to be brought about not farre from the shore, ready prepared for fight, as thinking the Carthaginians would not suffer him to approach the City, without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginian ships were upon other Employment gone from the Navy, which because they were not return'd the Admirall refueld to venture on the Fight with the Reft. Wherefore Entring without Resistance, Themist and Pitystratus yielding Possession, he took into his hands the Publick Treasure, an hundred and twenty Covered ships, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre.

In the Interim came Embaftadors from the Leontines, whose Prince Heraclidas offered the City and all his Forces. Four thoufand Foot, and five hundred Horfe. Neither were other Cities flower in their Submifion, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyrrhus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, sent every one back to his own City, entertaining now more ample Hopes in his mind, intending if affairs proceed fo favourably as to pass over into Africa, Things went not so well with his Confederates in Italy, for Milo, who was left at Tarquent with part of the Army, was not able to protect them from the hostility of the Romans, now in the abfence of the King and his main Strength. But as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarquentine warre, both the Confuls converted their forces againft Samnium. The Samnitians (feeing their Fields burn't, their Caffles purpliz'd, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were forfaken by their Friends) being inferior both in strength and Courage, forfaking their Townes and Villages, betook themselves to the high and craggy Mountains, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of most value they could in fuch a Tumult and fear convey away. Among the Romans besides the Emulation of their Commanders, there was arisen great Negligence and Carelefsnes (the Indifpenfable Companion of Prosperity) caused by their own Conftant good Succes, and their Enemies Fear. Hereby they suffered some Loss and more Disgrace; for their Souldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult passages were beaten back and destroy'd by the Samnitians, who had pofted themfelves of advantageous places; many were slain, being overwhelmed with Stones and Darts, or tumbled down the Precipices; others having no convenience either of retreating or ftriving were taken alive. This Accident caufed the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Miffortune upon his Colleague, bafled he could have managed the busines better if he had been alone. C. Junius with his Legions remained in Samnium, P. Cornelius drew out his forces againft the Lucanians and Bruitians, where carrying about the Terror of his Armes, waiting the Grounds and burning the Villages, he had occasion'd great Efforts. In the utmost parts of the Italian Shore, towards the East and the Ionian Sea, where the promontory of Lucanium strethches forth it felle, is feen Croton of old very famous, and now also confiderable for it's Wealth; Through the midft of it in those days ran the River Eufpus, on each fide whereof the Multitude of Buildings were encondized with a wall of Twenty miles circumference. This City the Conful not daring to beafure, had thoughts of obtaining by Treatery, for he was put in hopes by many of the Roman faction there, that if he would timely advance his forces to the walls of it, being now deftitute of foreign Aide, he might eaflily take it by the help and afliftance of thofe who were weary of Pyrrhus his Dominacion, but it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or fulpcion of Treafon, which is feldom long hid, the Crotonians had procured aid from Milo: Nichomachus came to them with a ftrong band of Lucanians, who iffuing out upon the Confull (not aware of any thing, but confidently coming up to the walls without fear of Danger) beat back with the hauftter and wounding of many of his Men. Rufinus defiring by Coufell to remedy that losf he had by his Rafhnites futfain'd, on ficut purpofe encraft the Rumour of his Overthrow, and that he might feem bruenk with the greater fear pretends to defift from his Enterprise, commanding the Baggage to be pack'd up as for a fudden Departure; This News was quickly bafi'd about the City (as from a Camp fo meft needes be) and besides a probable caufe of the busines, their Credulity was help'd forward by their desire to have it fo, when on a fudden (their minds being already thus inclin'd) a certain Captive (being thereunto laboured by the Conful, in hope of Liberty and further Reward) comes into the City, as in this haffy departure of the Romans he had taken opportunity to Ecape: He informs them that Cornelius Rufinus, having not strength enough to force Croton, was gone to Locri, being invited by some who promifed to betray it to him. By and by comes another who confirming the former news, added moreover, That the Romans were now on their March. And while they discover his Raffhnes and Troopes moving that way which leadeth to Locri. Nichomachus being deluded by this Wile, marcheth swiftly with his forces the neareft way to Locri, intending likewise to defend it, which when Rufinus by fecret Meffengers underfood, he turneth back prefently to Croton, as upon better advice, fo with better Succes then before. His diligence was made prosperous, not only by the security of his Enemies, but by the favour of Fortune alfo, for a thick mist chas'd to surround him, fo that he was almoft within the walls with his Victorious army before the Crotanians underflow he was returned. The joy of this victory, of it selfe ample enough, was abundantly creased by other as glorious successes; Fortune seldom observing a mean on either hand. For Nicomachus receiving himself to have fall into a remediless Error, not knowing what to doe, as he returned to Tarquinii, was met by Rufius, lost great part of his men, and very hardly escaped himself with the Reit; When not being content to defend one City he lost two. For the Locris likewise being animad with this successe, having slave the garrisson Pyrrhus left among them, with the governour of it, whose opposition they could no longer endure, betook themselves to the friendship of the Romans. Notwithstanding this Processe of affairs, the Sammites and other nations were not so far deflected, but that still they resolved to endure the work that Fortune could bring upon them, encouraged, before their own innate obstinacy, with their Hops of Pyrrhus's Returne, hearing the news of his victories in Sicily. For Pyrrhus (that we may relate his actions out of Italy also, which were performed in those times and places, having influence upon, and being joyzed with the Roman affairs) having felted things at Syracuse and Leonitium, went about the same time with his Army to Agrigentum, meeting Messengers by the way with News, that the Carthaginian Garison was thrust out of the City, and that the Ag农药tines yielded themselves and all they had into his protection; which accordingly at his coming they did. For Soffratus (who had delivered up Syracuse to him) together with the City, presented him with eight thousand foote, proper young men, and eight hundred horse, a force nothing inferior to the Epirets Pyrrhus brought with him. Thirty other Cities, which Soffratus had the command of, did by his means submit themselves to the Kings discretion.

These things thus transacted, he sent to Syracuse for all forts of weapons, engines, which were of use in the siege of Cities. For now his design was to assault the Cities under the Carthaginian Jurisdiction, having an army of thirty thousand, besides fifteen hundred horse, and the Elephants he brought over into Sicily. The first he took was Horaecia, where was a Patrick garrison, then Azone; After which the Selimusians, Halcyanzans, and Egeians following his fortune forsook the Carthaginian party, giving an Example to many other Townes in the same quarter of doing the like. The Erycines, confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and strength of the place, he was resolved with all his power to assault, having therefore order'd his men, himfelfe armed, coming up toward the walls, Vowed a Vow to Hercules, if that day he should manifest himselfe to the Gracians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the figure was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrows being drawn from their fittations, gave way to the placing ladders upon the walls, the King himfelfe first of all men entred into a mott noble fight against all opposers, tumbling some down with his shield, slaying others with his sword, and terriflying all with the greatness of his Courage and strength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every consideration of prosperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gaine the Citie at that one form, his foildiers being no leffe animated by his Example then fearfull of his danger, for both which reasons they fought with the greater contention. He then did facultie to Hercules according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of severall kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of January. But I wonder to find it ascribed to C. Junius, seeing Rufinus his Province was amongst them, and that he took two famous Cities, and that other Authors title him a Triumpnal Man.

Rome being not very severe, considering the progress of Pyrrhus his affairs, was otherwise much terrified with Prodigies and Pestilence; The molt horrid Omen was, that the Flame of Jupiter Capitolinus being litten with Thunder, the head thereof was strucken off and carried quite away, neither could it be found but by the act and care of the South-fayers. The Plague likewise committed great slaughter amongst them, taking away man and beast by a common Murrain; but was molt formidable in Abortion, for there was no young ones almoft of man or beast which came forth safe and entire, infomuch as it was believed the anger of the gods would confume all living creatures. Which Affidiction made the other Confulship of Q. Fabius Maximus Gagus very wherein, he had C. Gennius Elephius for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war against the Sammites and Lucanians; and two certain arguments are there that they made great slaughter of their enemies, for the same year Q. Fabius the Conful Triumphed over the Sammites, Lucanians and Brutians in the Quirinals, and those people sent Letters to Pyrrbus and Embassadors, declaring. They were utterly undone without speedy help, that they could no longer sustaine the power of the Romans, but must of necessity prevent the uttermost extremity by yielding up themselves. This thing much inclined Pyrrbus to depart the Iland and transport his forces again into Italy, seeing also his affairs now to be more dificult in Sicily, by reason the affections of men grew cold; and, by the consideration of some injuries received, were turned into hatred against him.

Which his resolution, and the series of enuing affairs, that they may the better be under-
Camp to Panormus it self, which received its name from the fair and ample haven which leadeth to it: This he took by force, and having likewise taken a place called Epityrite, seated in a pleasant mountain, but upon hard passages, between Panormus and Ervy, he had now the possession of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Lilybaem. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Mantians, whose town Dionysius the Tyrant had in the Punic War demolished. Wherefore the Carthaginians, seeing that of all their dominions in Sicily, their hopes were confin'd to this only place, resolved with their utmost strength to defend it against the preparations they understood Pyrrhus made for the siege of it. Wherefore bringing in thither a considerable strength of Souldiers, with plentiful provision, as likewise amunition of all forts (which they had opportunity enough to do, having the command of the seas) they diligently adhibited all care possible to fencet it on every side: Especially where it lay open to the land they erected many Forts and Towers, encompassed with large ditches: Their work was the sooner finifhed, in regard the town being for the most part of it built upon the Rocks of the sea, needed no artificial Bulwarks in those places. Now, though they made great preparations for the War, and had hired many forces, as from other Countries, so from Italy also; yet they sent Embassadors, promising, If they could obtain peace upon equal conditions, to assist him with mony and ships. Pyrrhus would hear no mention of money, defiring only to retain those Cities he had taken, seeming willing to allow them the possession of Lilybaem. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforcing him, That so long as the Carthaginians held Lilybaem, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to scale all the rest of Sicily) the Island would never be void of the fear of them: caused him to return an answer, That there was but this one condition of peace he would agree to, to wit, That they should clearly quit Sicily, and suffer the sea to be the bounds of either's dominion. The hopes of peace being thus broken off, he draweth his forces forthwith toward the City, and Marching his army not far from the walls, in such order as those who were tired might (by turns) be relieved by fresh men, he began the assault. But the Lilybatsians having a sufficient number of Souldiers to defend them, and being provided of Engines and Ammunition kept the City safe. For the Carthaginians had brought in so many Catapults and Scorpions that the whole compasse of the walls was not able to receive them.

When therefore a flower of all forts of weapons and darts overwhelm'd the Kings Men, playning many and wounding more, they defied from their Enterprise. Pyrrhus likewife set himself to work to make Engines of Battery, beside those he brought from Syracuse, and digging Mines under ground, he attempted all arts belonging to a siege: But the Carthaginians stoutly refiting, when he had for almost two months wearied himself in vain, and saw that the beleaguer'd hadfree eregrate and regrefse at the fea, the City could not be taken, he broke up his siege and employ'd his forces other where. For some Greek Cities, besides other heavy oppressions, being compelled to pay tribute, implored his affiurance against the Mamertines, living upon the fea coaft. Pyrrhus therefore leading his Army in halt, when he had taken and flain some Mamertines he found gathering Taxes in those places. Encountering their main body proved Conquerour, and took by force and demolifh'd many of their Garrifons. And hitherto the King by his Illinftruous performances had obtained great Power and Honour, having beside his other Vertues, with his singular Humanity not only won, but deferved the Love and Afection of the Cities. But this so great Fidelity, which one would think so firmely grounded, was in a moment defroy'd, as by that Levity of Mind which was never wanting in this people, and by the Intemperance of his friends, so chiefly by the Kings own fault. Who, being in adversity irreprehensibly good, was puffed up with pride in his prosperity, in which Condition Mens minds are indeed generally found to be weakeft. When therefore, as we have said, he esteemed a Fleet necessary for the accomplishment of his undertaking, and that though he had many ships, yet they were not well furnish'd with Sea-men, he very much offended the City with a Thirft Presf of Sea-men; being now on a sudden changed, and from his former gentleness proceeding to proud commands, threats and extreme punishments; these things nevertheles were tolerated, as having the pretence of publick good. But, when they faw those very men to be flain, by whose good will and affiurance chiefly he had obtained Sicily, many people, not by degrees, or interposing delays, but on the sudden changing their minds, revolted from his friendfhip, and applied themselves (as for every one was most opportune) to some to the Carthaginians, some to the Mamertines. So that cruelty, when it is alone is always grievous, doth then become utterly intolerable, when being exercised against the well-deferving, it contratteth (before the hatred properly due to it self) the deteation of an unthankful and pettifond mind. He seemeth to have brought himself to this necifity of governing by violence, being too much over-ruled by the naughty Afections and counsels of his own men, for unto them (being no whit better) did he bellow the riches which were fequeftr'd from the friends and kinmen of Agenocles. The chief Magiftracies of Cities he committed to his Penioners and Captains, not according to the statues and customs of the Cities, nor for the due time precrib'd, but in what manner, and for as long as he pleased. Law suits, and controversies, and all the whole administration of publick businesse he afflicted to himself, referring many to his Familiars and Favourites, who were hateful for their avarice and luxury, a like intent upon gaining and spending mony by wickednes, who being greedy to satisfie their own bift, make no diffinition between between Right and Wrong. Mens minde being hereby is cens'd they begun to muturm after ward openly to Complain why they had reported of their former Condition, if now the very same things were to be born Wish'd that in vain was Pyrrhus invited and receiued, if he studied to imitate those manners he came to punish, that no injury can possibly be of so sharp and aprehension, as that whereof is the Author who ought to have been the Averger. And now many began not very obstinately to move sedition, and cause a Revolution of things, whereas as he hearkning to pernicious Counsell, chose rather to encrease cauou of Offence, then take them away as what evil was by Injustice committed, were by Cruelty to be mended. In the meantime the Carthaginians, observing that Pyrrhus was not so very strong in his own Country forces, and was daily less affected by the Sicilians, conceiving hopes of recovering their lost Province, had sent over an new Army which found bulifs enough for the Epiporens, many flying over to them who flowd in fear of Pyrrhus's cruelty. Pyrrhus under pretence of the Pyrnick War, introducing Garrisons into the Cities, resolved by false accusations of Treason to take away the lives of the greatest men, thinking afterward the more easily to keep the people in awe. At length he aimed at Thescri and Sofffratus, the principal men of the whole Island, by whose affiliation chiefly (as we have declared) he obtained the command of Sicily. Thescri was slain, Sofffratus fled to the enemy, affording him no leffe help and authority to the calling Pyrrhus out of Sicily, then he had before to the bringing him in and continuing him there.

Upon this many Cities revolving, greater part to the Carthaginians, some to the Mamertines, Pyrrhus his affairs were reduced from a molt flourishing Condition to a very narrow and evil state. In this Conjuncture the embassage of his Italian confederates came not unwelcome to him, complaining That having loft all things, they had very few Cities left which were able with much ado to keep the Enemy from entering their walls. This gave him a faire and honourable Pretense of departing, that he might seeme, not expelled out of Sicily by the Carthaginians, But to return into Italy for the Relief of his oppriffed associates. Being now jut going, when he seriously considered the feitution and wealth of the Island, and disposition of the Inhabitants, O (faith he) what a fair field do we leave the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in for Supremacy! And his Prefage proved true, as was witnessed by the wars suddenly ensuing, wherein so many Navies were destroyed, and Armies routed.

But the Enemies Courage increasong with their Fortune, Pyrrhus had neither a faire departure out of Sicily, nor a quiet Voyage to the Tarentines in Italy. The Carthaginians assaulting him in his Passage crofs the Sea, sunk f彭ty of his ships, and made the rest ufeles (the Epiporens almost utterly unskilful in Maritime affairs, being not able to grapple with men of fuch Experience therein) So he fled out of the Fight with Twelve ships into Italy, who had come thence, with above an hundred, besides a greater number of ships of Burthen. But gathering together these fouldiers who made a shift from the Overthrow to escape to fhorre, he had presently a strength so great that he conceived hopes of taking Pargum by force. But being beaten off by the Carpantians who defended it, he presently fell into a great danger. For as he led his Army through bold and difficult passages, the Enemy out of Ambush fell upon his Reare, and flew a great Number of his Men, with two Elephants. 'Twas no contemptible force, neither for Number nor the quality of the Warrantions, which thus affaulted them; they were little lefs then ten thoufand old fouldiers, moft of them Mamertines, who trufling in their friendfhip and cognation with the Rhapsians, having underflood that Pyrrhus intended to return for Italy, had crofsd the sea before him, and in hope of prey had privily disposed of themselves in advantageous places to make a sudden irruption upon him.

Pyrrhus, according to his wonted Boldnefle fighting in the front of his Battel, received a wound in his head, which when he was gone alide to dié, one of the enemies of large stature, and gellant in his Armour, advancing before the reft of his Fellows, challenged him with a loud Voice, bidding him, If he were alive, to come forth. Pyrrhus burning with anger, and Terrible in Countenance, the blood running about his face, his men not being able to hold him, made a sudden affault upon him, and with a blow on his head struck him to the ground. 'Tis reported, his sword was fo well temper'd and his Arm as fo strong, that at one stroke he clef't the Man in funder, even from the head to the bottom of his body, his parts on each side divided falling to the ground. The enemy terrified with the strange novelty of this spectacle, and admiring him as above the ordinary Ranke of Men, left off the fight. Pyrrhus, being rid of this trouble, had notwithstanding little joy. For, inasmuch as he now loft part of his Carriage, and that the wealth he had gather'd by the spoils of the Sicilians, was loft in his left fight with the Carthaginians, he was in great want of moneys, fo that his fouldiers murmuring for pay, knowing not how elsewhere to provide it, he was compel'd to feize upon the Treasury of Proserpine: Her Church at Locris was in those days most famous for the Reputation of its holines, which town, when Pyrrhus had taken by the assistance of his faction within it, he committed many horrid facts by slaughter and rapine, more then the just revenge of his ılan Garrison did require. But there being nothing left which men would or could contribute to him, he laid hands on the holy money, being urged thereto by his worst friends, who had most commonly been the authors of every pernicious counfel: there were Euvagor the fon of Thedorus, Balcer the fon of Nicander, and Dinarchus the fon of Nicetas. They did not only per Pyrhus, telling him that all things must yield to Necessity, but were themselves instruments in the sacrifice, digging up a vast summe of Gold, which had many years been preserved in vaults under ground. Pyrrhus rejoicing faid, there is nothing more foolish than unfeasible Devotion, and not to accept of Money ready prepar'd is the part of a mad man. And putting it into his ships he gave order to have it carried to Tarentus, himself going by land.

But this his fact was not more foule in the Commission, then it was unhappy in the Issue. A Storme suddenly arising upon the change of Wind, in the night time, turned about the ships in the dark; breaking one into pieces, and forcing others into the Maine. The ships which conveyed the Holy Money being shattered and torn into pieces, were sunk with all the men in them but the money it selfe lying upon some loose planks, was by the waves carried to the shore very near the Temple, from whence it was the day before taken. Pyrrhus underlandering the Accident, commanded the money to be diligently gather'd up and returned to its former place, thinking thereby to appease the Angry Deity. Nevertheless hencethoward he had no better success. Fortune Eluding all his Designes whatsoever, even those which were upon good advice, and Virtuously undertaken. Which he did always after constantly impute to the Anger of the Offended Goddes, as Proculus the writer of his History, and himself in his Commentary do affirm, and when the thing was newly done, not being able by many Sacrifices to make propitiation to Proculus, he put to death all the Authors of that unhappy Councell, the instruments of the Fact, and every one who had but lightly confented to the Commission of it. And these being executed according to their Deferts, Pyrrhus prosecuting his Design had afterward a quiet journey to Tarentus, The Romans being still more affrighted with the Plague, and fearing a new war upon Pyrrhus his return into Italy, attempted all Means both Divine and Humane for their Relief. 'Twas an old opinion, that the Peitience might be prov'd by the Dictators stricking in of a Naile, for the Experiment of which hopes 'tis probable that P. Cornelius Rufus was chosen Dictator, for as the greatness of the Calamity might-well provoke them to try all Remedies, so we find that Rufus was the year after taken notice of by the Cenours, when he had been twice Consull and twice Dictator, neither can there be found more certain monument, or a more convenient place for that his Dictatorship. Against the sicknes providing what Remedy they could, their Chiefeart care and diligence was required in matter of Armes, especially in regard of the Difficulty in raising Men. For besides the length of the Warre, the continuance of the Peitience had made men weary of entring into action, infomuch as the young Men did with wonderful Obliination decline the service. But the severity and constancy of C. M. Curius Dematius the second time Consull overcame this their wilfulness, for he now had entred the Magistracy with L. Cornelius Leonus his Colleague. When therefore in the Capitoll he first began his Leavy, because no man answered, he caufed the names of all the Tribes to be call'd into an Urne, and the Pellian Tribe coming out first, he caufed the first man of that Tribe whose name was drawn to be immow'd; and when he refr'd to appear, he fequester'd and sold his Goods, when afterwards he appea'd to the Tribunes complaining of the Consulls Injustice, he sold him also, saying, The Commonwealth had no need of such Citizens who knew not how to obey. The Tribunes nevertheless did not relieve him, and afterward the example being judged very wholesome grew into Cutilome, that when a Leavy was rightly and duly made, he who would not be a foildier should be told for a slave. Others being terrified by this Precedent did the more readily give in their Names, and having fill'd up their Legions both the Consulls marched into the Enemies Country; Leonus into Lucania, Curius into Samnium. Pyrrhus having intelligence of their motion, muster'd his army at Tarentus, and found himself almost twenty Thouland strong in Foot, together with three thousand Horse.

With these and the choice young men of the Tarentines he entred Samnium, but found not the Inhabitants so obedient as heretofore, they came not in so freely and readily as they had done, not only because their courage was over-weighed with the great and many losses they had sustained, but because they were jutly exasperated, imputing all their calamities to Pyrrhus, which they had not suffer'd, not had he by his departure into Sicily betray'd his Italian associates. Nevertheless he gathered together so great a strength, that he sent one part into Lucania to baifie the other Consull, while himself encountered Man. Curius, thinking if he once overcame him, he should easily complete his Victory over the rest. But the Roman very well understanding, that there is no Battalia comparable to the Macedonian Phalanx, when it hath Rome to spread and expatiate it self, kept himself in craggie and difficult places; and because he expected help from Lucania, and that the Auguries alfo and Entrails of Beasts promised no good success, he declined fight as much as might be: so much the more earneft was Pyrrhus to engage before the two Connullar Armies were joyn'd together. Chosing therefore out of his Army those who were most forward, he refolvd to affault the Roman Camp in the night time, when he might not be discover'd. But while he prepared all things for his intended purpose, he fell into a deep sleep and dreamt, that the greater part of his Teeth fell out, and that an abundance of blood flowed out of his mouth; in consideration whereof being much perplex'd, he intended to delit from his enterprise; but his friends earneftly persuading him, Left he should never again have the same opportunity offer'd him, he gave order to advance. Near the City of...
Mileventum (for that was the name of it in those days) are Mountainous and Woody places, which by degrees stretching themselves into somewhat more even ground, at length end in a very fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Tauromenion Fields.

Now Pyrrhus beginning his journey from the lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed, was wilder for want of knowledge in the ways, so much that (the day breaking) he was discovered from the Roman camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemy, yet, (because there was no doubt made but fight they must, and their sacrifices now proving more favourable) with the Consul's conduct cheerfullydffed out, and falling upon the foremost of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and in very good order) drove them backward, killing no small number of men, and taking some Elephants which the enemy left behind. This success encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and descend into the open field in Battle-array prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both sides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmish, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrhus now again fought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire even to their Reserve. There had the Consul placed a strong force (resolving upon this occasion to engage himself) which he commanded, being now fresh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an easy and ready way to oppose these beasts, that they were sooner diverted by fire then the word: Against them therefore were provided Iron instruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being let on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beasts, or on the wood of the Towers, they fluck fast by reason of their hooked sharp points. Thee instruments and divers forts of darts, being flung from the upper ground, drove the Elephants into fury, partly by terror, partly by the pain of their wounds, so that their masters not being able to govern them, they rushed back upon their own battle, filling it with fear and slaughter. The beginning of this Rout is reported to be by a young E Hebrew, which being wounded in his head, sent forth a querulous noise, at which known voice the Dam was first startled, and she increasing the tumult, at length the rear were all in confusion and turned into flight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the slain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrhus being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the rest of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to stand against them. 'Tis said the King in that Battle had thrice the number of the Romans, even fourscore thousand foot, and six thousand horse; of these they report the most fifty, and thirty thousand were slain, who report the leaves, fifty six and twenty thousand; thirteen hundred were taken prisoners, and eight Elephants, Pyrrhus with a few horsemen escaped to Tarentum. The Camp of Pyrrhus being taken, as it caused admiration, so was it of great use to the Romans. For they hereofore, as other people, ordered their Camps (scattering by companies in the manner of Cottages: Pyrrhus is held to be the first who rightly measuring and dividing spaces, contained the whole Army within one Trench; and by his example the Romans being allisted, and adding what they thought convenient, attained to that most perfect manner of pitching their Camps which afterwards they used.

This year was very famous, not only for their happy war abroad, but by reason also of Domettis affairs, and the notable severity of their City Discipline. O Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Emilius Paetus, being Censors together, took away from many the Publick horses, and passed by many in calling the Senate. But most remarkable was Cornelius Rubens his note of Inflammy, who having been twice Conful and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Censors, and this reason given of his Punishment, That they found in his house the weight of ten pounds in plate to serve at meals: And in this Condition not only himself but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the highest honours, before Sylla the Dictator.

Such was the Parimony of this City in those days, and afterward so great the extravagancy, that it was by the Fathers condemned as an argument of intolerable Luxury, what their children would shortly esteem but a base and contemptible piece of householdfilsuff: Every mans estate being ceded and valued, the Army was purged by sacrifices; there were cessed two hundred seventy one thousand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Confuls entered the Capitoll in triumph, first Curcius, whose triumph was the more illustrious, as for the fame of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, so did it exceed in pomp and splendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were set on only with broken arms and Gallick waggons, nor any spoiles led but flocks and herds of Cartel but now there was a worthy shew both for the variety of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the spoils. Epirots, Thessalians Macedonians, Apulians, Lucilians, Bruttians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond sea rarities, and the influxion of the Tarentine Luxury. But the most wonderful and joyful spectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs. (for the rear were dead of their wounds) This was the first time they were ever seen at Rome; the common people called them Locus-Bulls, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto best acquainted with, and their deno-denomination from the place they first saw them in: within few days after was the other Confuls Triumph nothing so gallant, though his performances were not to be despised; he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in comparison of Curious his Glory the Esteem of these things were not so high. Among the rest who had Rewards beflow'd on them for their Courage, he gave to Sex. Cornelius Murenda a Crown of Gold out of the spoiles, because by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Sammites was taken. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different Polture. They had been long weary of Pyrrhus his Domination, but now after this unhappy fight, their minde were so filled with fear and Indignation that they could take no Rest.

The King having been a long time averse from the Roman Warre, now utterly despairing of the Conquest, thought of nothing more than how to get safely and honourably out of Italy.
But keeping his Counsell to himselfe, he encouraged his Associates, That they should not be cast downe by one unlucky Overthrow, that they had not receiv'd so much loss by the last fight, as by the former they had caus'd to the Romans, who notwithstanding could not be prevailed to Peace upon equal Conditions; That now they should imitate the Roman Constancy, and referre themselves for better Fortune, and all would yet go well; That there is yet strength sufficient left, where-to maintain a long Warre; That in Greece he had many Patent Friends, from whom he might certainly expect succour. Neither were these things incredible, For he had already, especially by Polyomy (who was then King of Macedon) been manifestly afflieted, he being then in great Estimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honourd by the Erohians (then a most powerful Nation) as also by the Macedonians and the Kings of Lylyum, having obliged some by Counteries, others by Fear. Yet all his boating was more with intent, to retain his Confedermes (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the less were open for his Return, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Trust in Foreign Aid. Sending nevertheless his Embassadors to the Kings of Asia and Macedonia, of some he crave dons, of others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he crave dons both. With these hopes keeping his Associates firme to him (having in the mean time undertak'd provided all things for his Departure) his Embassadors now return'd from Antigonus. Attembling therefore his own and the Italian Princes, he read unto them not those Letters which now he receiv'd, but others which came before from Antigonus, promising plentiful Alliances suddenly to be fent; By this Craft having deluded both his own Associates, as also the Romans who garrition'd neer him, the night following without any hindrance he hir'de falfly, and made the Cerrmanian Mountains a Promontory of Epirus. But that he might seem not dishonourably to have relinquish'd the war, and ingender a belief of his Return after he had accomplish'd the Design he was call'd aside for, he left behind him Milo to defend the Castle of Tarentum, and that he might not onely by hope of Reward, but by fear of the like Punishment, continue faithful, he gave him a Lease whose cover mas made of Nicator his skin, whom he had put to death for his Trefon against him. Leaving therefore with him a garrition of focondiers, with the Reit (to wit eight thousand foot, and five hundred horfe) he return'd into his Kingdom, having been six years abente. At Rome not knowing but that Pyrrhus Pyrrho's would renew the warre, they did at their Assembly choose M. Curius Consull again, because he onely having had good succes against the King, was thought like to carry on the warre with great Authority, and bell fortune, of the Patricians Mr. Cornelius Murenda was chosen, being promis'd by his late purchas'd honour, and the Commendation of his Counothersmen, under whose command he was left year; These being made Consull, reconven'd the heat of the warre against the Lucanians, Sammites and Broonians, who defending themselves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occasion of any Memorable action like the for-er. Neither was Curious his Glory hereby diminisht; every one still judging, that that Valiant K. Pyrrhus did not fo much for the overthow't nation'd, as hearing such a Captain as Curios now again coming forth against him, To him therefore was attributed the Glory of having chajed Pyrrhus out of Italy, and finishing the Warre. In that year which followed Curios his Third Consullhip, there came Embassadors from the Alexandria Kings with gifts to Rome, and in the Consullhip of C. Dorfo and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolomes Phila-delphiis hearing of Pyrrhus his flight, fent to concert with the Romans, and to defire to be Esteem'd their Friend and Associate. The Romans thought it very honourable that their Friendship was bought by Kings so Potent and farre distant, therefore courteously receiving and entertaining the Embassadors, they agreed to enter League with Ptolomes, for the Confirmation whereof, and to return the like Kind office to the Kings; they fent Embassadors to him chosen out of their Principal Men, of the Consulls &; Fabius Gurgus, and with him C. Fabius Epit Livic, Piller, and Numerius Fabius Piller, and O. Oulinius. Thrice being gone, the Consull had good succes against the Italian People, who fliil out of Necelcity and Defpair kept up their Armes. The Triumph which Claudius Canina made in the Quirinalis over the Lucanians, Sammites and Broonians, is an Argument, that his Actions were of the greater Confequence: But the Joy of all this Prosperity was somewhat diminu'd by Sextilius a Velthall Virgin, who againt the Rules of her Order being found guilty of Incelf, was thought to provoke the Anger of the Gods.

But appealing the gods by Sacrifices and Ceremonies, they turned the punishment on the head of the delinquent, and buried her alive at the Colline Gate. While the same men were Confuls there were Colonies planted, Cufa among the Volsciains, and in Lucania Paffium, which the Greeks call Petdoma; this city the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Samnites and others, but of the Tarentines also. L. Papiarius Curso, and Sp. Corvillus the second time Confuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Bruttians and Tarentines for their Provinces, did by their wisdom and worthy deeds fulfill the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Confus was on purpose chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquer'd by Corvillus the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papiarius with great slaughter having overcome the Bruttians and Lucanians, compelled them to sue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territory were interchangeably mislead) Papiarius had to do also with the Samnites, Corvillus with the Bruttians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines routed and put to flight, but their City also recover'd into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehends the death of Pyrrhus, the subtility of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation between them and the Romans.

Pyrrhus, in two years since he failed from Italy, left a Garrison in the Calle of Tarrenus, thereby to begot hopes of his return, which afterward being more confidently expected by reason of his success in Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce flattering spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonos, because he sent him no assistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a set battle, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear lest he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did suddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being inatidably desirous of increasing his power, under pretence of releting Cleomenes in his Kingdom of Sparta (being then at odds with Arcus) he entred Peloponnesus with a purpose to keep it in his own hands; and though he did in vain assault their City, yet he affrighted the Lacedemonians with great calamities: In Arcus, in the mean time, there being two Factiones, Arischippos the head of the one called in Antigonos, Arischis Patron of the other invited Pyrrhus to his relief and for the pulling down his adversary. For Antigonos was also come into Peloponnesus to afflit the Lacedemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrrhus understanding his men were hard put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Brah Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was presently possest with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an ancient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolved to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and fouldiers coming in to his succour, meeting Helenus the son of Pyrrhus, quite stoped up the passage, so that some striving to go out, some to come in, the enemy likewise foresight upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedemonians who came along with Arcus, some Elephants also, all crouding and being croud one by another in narrow streets, caused great fear and tumult amongst them.

Pyrrhus in the midst of all, every where endeavouring to protect his own, and beat back the enemy (giving advice, crying out with his voice and lifting up his hand) was by a certain young man of Arcus lightly wounded with a spear. This young man's mother a poor old woman (fitting amongst others upon the houfe top to behold the fight) when she saw Pyrrhus in fury and violence fetting upon him who wounded him, being affonified at her son's danger, suddenly snatcht up a Tile, and with both her hands flung it down on the Kings head. So miserable and void of honour was Pyrrhus his death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Counsel or Skill in Marshall affairs, besides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroy'd the fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wisdom and Circumpection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry in the acquiring.

This news, being brought into Italy, did diversely, according to their several Affections, cause joy in some Cities, and sorrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what terms they could. But the Garrison of the Epirots, and Mile governor of the Calle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees of the lighter injuries and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; so that the Tarentines being on each hand pressed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, sent Embassadors to crave succour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possesed great part of Sicily and with the Coast:
Coasts-Towns of Italy rather in their own hands then the Romans, readily came with a mighty Navy, pretending only to call out our Milia, but resolving, if they gained Tarentum, to maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Consul was also come, Tarentum was shut up on all sides, the Romans beleaguering that part of the City and Castle by land, the Carthaginians besieging the same Castle by sea. The Romans, in this state of affairs, being on no lese licentious left the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should loot it, subtly attempting all means of victory, treated with Milia by Convenient Messengers. That if by his means they obtained Tarentum, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, with a more convenient force, to depart with bag and baggage. Milia, finding nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines. That joining Councils together they might deliberate on their Common safety: and at length persuadeth them, To fend himself Embassador to Papirius diligently to conclude on Articles for all their Benefit. As they had willingly hereunto assented out of weariness of Care and dangers: Milia accordingly, being gone to the Consul, with whom he had secretly contriv'd his Designe, brings back better present conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much security and confidence lay aside all care and Circumspection, giving Milia opportunity of delivering not only the Castle, but also the City it selfe up to the Romans. The Carthaginians no what contented with this Event, nevertheless pretending, Themselves friends to the Romans, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milio, hoisted and returned.

Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarned the Carthaginians, That if they intermeddled in the Tarentine affairs, they should make a breach of the League, and that they not only lighted this admonition, but sent Auxiliaries to stand in Battell against them, upon which account chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily, though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing With evil or delictful intent. As I will not deny but that some such passage might happen between the Generals, or that the people commonly disfoure to, while the Romans brook'd not the others presence, and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design, so I think there afterwards arose more probable caules of that War, in that it brake not out on the sudden. And that it was occasioned chiefly upon the Mamertines account, while the League was entire between the Romans and Carthaginians. The Conuls returning home, were received with the joy and falutes of all, and triumphd in great Pompe, with much Goodwill of the People. In the mean time C. Fabius Gurges, and the others who were sent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Refult of their Embassage. They were receiv'd and Entertain'd with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, that great and Magnificent gifts were sent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their departure, that it seemed to become the Roman dignity and abolition, modestly to refuse the first, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other business, added to the publick Treasury; that as Alexandria, when being invited to publick feasts, they had Crowns of Gold sent them according to custom, they did for them make twice as much as receive them, but in the night time put them upon the Kings Statues. The Senate wonderfully rejoicing, both at the Success of their Journey, and the Gravity of the Embassadors, giving them thanks, That they had by their Conduite render'd the Roman Manners venerable to Foreign Nations, commanded the gifts they had convyenged into the Treasury to be restor'd them. The people likewise decreed the like, saying, The Commonwealth would be excellently well managed if the half means of growing rich by Publick employments were taken away: And the Quoers, according to command, willingly restor'd the money to the Embassadors worthy of the reward of their Abstinence, did with as much credit receive the Egyptian gifts as they had refused them. C. Fabius, who was prime Man in the Embassy, was, I believe, in this consideration also preferred before so many Egregious men, and chosen Prince of the Senate by M. Curius and L. Papirius the Censors, being now, by reason of the Nobility of his Family, his Fathers Merits, two Conulshipps, and as many Triumphs, Inferior to none in Honour. The fame men being Conuls, M. Curius the Censor was at coft, out of the enemies spoils, to bring the water of the River Anyn to Rome: So much scouring to encrease his private wealth by them, that being on a time by some ill-willers taxed of having perverted the publick mony, producing a piece of wood which he was wont to use in facrifice, took Oath, That of all the enemies plunder, he never brought nothing else into his house. He was a man indeed of high deferts, as for the greatness of his Exploits, so for his many Illustrious examples in other Virtues, as we shall by the by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings: For I count it not unworthy or unbecoming the Officce of an Historian, to recount those things whereby those who are hereafter to undertake the management of publick affairs may be no lese instruct'd in the attaining Felicity by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Subire War (when there was such plenty of spoils that Fabius the writer of the History, thinketh the Romans then to have had the first taste of Riches) Curius, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but the confidence and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardship of life. For when the Grounds of the Enemy were appropriated to the Commonwealth, he distributed to every private Person but forty Acres by the Man: And the Senate allotting him a greater portion, he being contended with the fame Measure he had meted to others, said, His
HE most potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquished, and peace settled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Consultation how to make a good use of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had born Arms against them; the loss of part of their Territories, taking a more severe revenge of the Tarentines, by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended; they were therefore commanded to refrain all those Arts and Ships, their Walls were demolished, a Tribute imposed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old score more to be intended, then to punish the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years possessed their City. They foreseeing that the Roman affairs proceeding so prosperously, their wickedness would not pass unreavenged, had very diligently taken care for whatsoever belonged to strengthening the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very conscious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the same arts be maintained. Besides their own innate Fiercenesse, they much confided in the friendhip of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their success against the Carthaginians and Pyrrhus, whereby they had sufficiently made experiment of the strength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulsed the enemies from the siege. They foresaw therefore to such an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Grotio, which was by some betrayed to them, they flew the Roman Garrison and demolished the City. Wherefore L. Geminus the Consul, who was that year Colleague with C. Quentellus, had commission to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was besieged. But while they strongly resisted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Consul, having suftained some incommodities, and became want of necessary provisions, was affiicted with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracuse. For he, being offended with the Mamertines, did likewise hate their associates of Rhegium; he was likewise moved by the encrease of the Roman power, to preoblige them to future benefits, as occasion should serve.

The Citie being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Consul disabled upon certain Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, many whereof had fled thither as to a sanctu-ry., were put to death: The Legionary fouldiers were carried to Rome that the Senate might paffe Judgement upon them. Herein was shewed a notable Example of publick feverity, for the Senate decreed, first, They should all be secured in prison, and afterward, be led to Execution: And when M. Fulvius Flaccus, Tribune of the People interceded for them, declaring, They ought not to take the Liver of so many Citizens, contrary to the Laws and Customs of their Forefathers, The Senators perfitting in their Resolution neglected the clamours of the Tribune, and Justice was accordingly executed upon the guilty. But let it by no where appear they might contract an odium, and the sorrow of the vulgar people be aggravated if such a multitude should at one time be put to death, they did every day execute fifty,ift? scouring, then beheading them. Moreover it was ordered that neither their Bodies should be buried, nor any Mourning made for their Death. Decius Jobilus (who had lived unto that day, after the Loffe of his sight, that he might die with the more griece) took away his own life in prison. Following the greatest number of Authors I have reported the whole Legion, even foure thousand men, to have been beheaded in the Market-place at Rome; but I think it more probable what is related by Polybius, That but three hundred of that Legion came alive into the Romans power, that the Ift, at the taking of the City, desperately fighting, chose rather to be slain, as well knowing that after such hainous widenes, nothing could be expelld upon surrender, but more torments and a cruel ignominious death. The City of Rhegium with all its former Rights, Laws, and Liberties was restored to the ancient inhabitants, as many as could any where be found or enquired out.

This act of Justice did much increase the Reputation of the City of Rome, and thereby was gained no leffe Love from all the Italians and neighbouring People, then their arms had caufed fear. In the Confulship of C. Genunius, and Cn. Cornelius there was war with the Saminites, a people of Umbria, inhabiting the Appennine Mountains: by what reason provoked, or in what hopes trusting, they now oppofed the Formidable power of the Romans (thole writings which are remaining making no mention) I am not able to Divine: Likewise the whole Proceedings of the war are utterly lofl, and of the memory of these things, nothing else is come to our knowledge, but that Cn. Cornelius Triumphed over the Saminites. Tis reported there was a molt sharp winter in thefe Confuls time, in fo much that the Sap being chill'd Trees withered; That Tiber was covered over with deep Ice, and that the Cattel perifhed for want of Fodder; so great and vehement was the coldnefs of the air, that moniftrous hills of snow lay unmeltd in the Market-place for forty days togethere. The thing being unusual in that Climate, and by many look'd upon as a Prodigie, perplexed mens minds with wonderful terror, their fear being not long after much enacted, when C. Oenius Gallus and C. Fabius Pictor being Confuls, many strange unheard of fights were seen, and many more reported. At Rome the Temple of Salus with part of the walls was fmiten with thunder and lightning; three Wolves before day brought a carkaf half eaten into the City, and being themselves feared by the noife of men, left it in the Market-place torn into pieces limb from limb.

At Faemii the walls were fayed to be often struck and cast down with thunderbolts, and news was brought, that in the Caelinian fields, the earth opened, and fire suddenly brake out, which flaming for three whole daies together, burnt five acres of ground to ashes, inforrnuch that not only all the fruits on that place were bllef, but even the Trees died at the very Roots. Those things caufed more fear then mercy at Rome; No great matter ensued, but that a War was made against the Picentins, which were the next year finifhed, added likewise that province to the Roman Jurifdictions. Now in the City began the Coining Silver, (their wealth being increased by their victories) whereas before Bralia only wasfued in all Exchanges; but then pennes and half pennes were made of Silver, which went for ten, and five pounds of braffe; there were likewise fiffer pieces which being esteemed at two pound and an halfe of braffe, were from their value called Serviores. It was called, Moneta, because it was coined in the Temple of Iune, to whom that Name was given, by reafon the did Moee, that is, adornm the Romans when in the War of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines they Confulted about their wants, That money would not be wanting to those, who observed Justice and prosecuted War. The Confuls C. Galus and C. Fabius went forth to apprehend Lollius the Samnite, who having been Hostage at Rome had privily escaped, and now poftellinf a certain Callife, committed Plunder and Pillage round about, flirring up the minds of his Countrymen to Rebellion, when they were fcarce well composd by the latt peace.

But he with the forces he had gather'd (being for the most part unarmed) could not long reftil: The greatest difficulty and danger was in the Province of the Carcines (a part of Samnien near the Frentaner) where the Romans affaulted a well fenced place, the Receptacle of Lollius his spoils, and from great hopes falling into great fear, did at length obtain the Victory. Some of the Garrison upon condition of Pardon, let the Romans into the walls in a bright Moon-thiny night, and the Townsman multuring themselves together upon the tumult; when they first began to fight a great drift of snow fell and took away their fight: This accident was a great help to the Carcines against the Romans, who were ignorant of the Pillages, in fo much that they were in very great danger, and now ready to give back and retreat (which in the dark could not have been done without much los) when on a sudden the Snow ceased and the Moon shone out again, and then being freed from blind fear, they did by their courage make way to Ve:
Victory. These combats were the cause why the Picents were not vanquished in those Consuls time.

But the year following P. Serniprenius Sophus, and Appius Claudius Censor the son of Caesar being Consuls undertook the War, and happily finished it. About these times was a Colony planted at Ariminum in the Picene grounds, which belonged to the Senones of Gallia, and another at Mataventum in Samnium, but changing the Name, which seemed Ominous, they called it Beneventum. The Sabines who were many years agoe admitted into the City, had now the liberty of Votes granted them. Claudius had also business in Umbria, where he took Carthage and sold the inhabitants for slaves. But because the war seemed not very honestly to be managed by the General, the Romans preferring Justice before their own profit, decreed, That the Camerites should be sought out and redeemed, that they should be received into the City, have a place of habitation allotted to them in the Aventine Mount, and their ground restored to them.

Greater was the joy for the Picentine Victory, which was thought worthy to be Coincd in their new Pieces of silver, that it might the more publickly be known, and the Memory thereof transmitted to Posterity. Q. Cassius the son of Quinctus, by order of Senate, took care for coining the Money, representing on one side Picus the son of Saturnus (for he is thought to be the Father of that Nation) on the other side a Roman Magistrate reaching forth his hand to a supplicant. And that, by subduing of that Country, a great access of strength was made to the Romans is Maniffest, in that three hundred and threee thousand Picentins subjected themselves unto them. For that War the Conuls, as they deferred, did Triumph, but Sempronius his Glory was the greater, in that with more dangers and hazard he had fought against the stronger enemy. For a sudden Earthquake, being very prodigious, happened, as the battles were set in array now ready to encounter, But the Conuls composed the fouldiers fearful minds, by an oration very fit for the occasion, telling them, The enemy was no less troubled with necessary devotion then themselves, that theirs would be the Illory who first flashed off fear, voluntarily charged the enemy before he was well come to himself. And vowing a Temple to the Goddess Tellus, if he would grant Victory to the Romans, he began the Charge, which was as Couragiously received and fo great a slaughter made, that, 'tis reported, the leffer half remained even of the Victorious Army. After this which (as other the Townes of the Picentins, so likewise) Arculums the Metropolis yielded it self to Sempronius, and by its example the whole Nation submitting it self in obedience, obtained peace of the Romans. All that part of Italy being now subdued, which lieth toward the Sicilian and Ionian sea, there remained only the Sallentins to be brought in, who live upon the utmost coast where the upper and Ionians seas meet, to these therefore as by a Contagion did the war proceed from the Picentins, M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Julius Libo being Consuls: The quarrel was pretended because they had received Pirrus into their Havens and Towns when he came first out of Epirus. But indeed the much truer caues of the war were thought to be the Convenience of the Haven of Brundisium, where ships may go in and out with the same wind, the ease passage from thence into Illyrims and Epirus, and that they esteemed it very opportune to have the same Bounds both of Italy and their own dominions. Both the Conuls triumphed for this war in one day, which was the eighth of the Calends of February.

Having overcome the Sallentins in a feat battel, they took Brundisium, the most famous Town in those quarters; other successe also they had, being aiffilid, as is reported, by Pales the Goddes of Shepherds, who of her own accord, as a reward of the Victory, desired to have a Temple dedicated to her in Rome. The greater part of the Sallentins being vanquished by these, the war was finished and the victory completed by the next years Conuls, who were Numerius Fabius C. F. M. N. and D. Junius, D. F. D. Nepos Pera. To these both the Umbrians and Sallentines yielded themselves. All Italy even between the River Po and the sea being generally settled, the Roman greatnes began to be famed and taken notice of by the neighbouring Islands, and the Continent adjoyning to the Ionian and Adriatic sea, casting in some hopes, in others fear.

For they who by violence and injury to their neighbours enlarged their own power, feared the Romans would prove an hindrance to their proceedings, the others contrarywise looking on them as a Succour, sent to them from heaven against the Oppression of their adversaries. The Apollonians were the first, who sending Embassadors to Rome craved their friendship; their Citie is casted threescore furlongs from the sea, being built by the Corinthians and Croceyans, having a very commodious haven, where the nearest passage is from Brundisium into Greece. The Illyrians and Macedonians are adjacent to them, so that against strong and Covetous neighbours they had much adoe to preserve their own liberty. The message was wonderful welcome and with much humanity received by the Romans, not so much for the wealth of the Citie which was but small, as for Future hopes in that they thought a way laid open and occasion given them of greater dignities hereafter: Insomuch that very sever punishment was inflicted on certain noble young men who upon a quarrel arising had strucken the Embassadors. Q. Fabius was not proceeded either by the Dignity of his office, for he was then Edile or the greatnesse of his Extraction, but was delivered up to the Apollonians for his offence. On Apolonius who was likewise Edile, was given up for the same crime, the Senate decreed, they should by He-

Heraid to be delivered up into the hands of the Embassadors that a Quaestum should be drawn up, and them to Brundusium left their friends and Kindred should receive them by the way. This was a great testimonie as of their publick faith, so of their wildome; for having a desire to draw foreign Nations into their friendship by the Reputation of their Justice, it much concerned them most precipitely to punish the injuries done to those who first came to enter into their Society. Neither would any thing have proved more destructive to their designs that the Appollonians should have repented themselves of their act, and others of their example. And hence saying that custom, which was constantly in after times observed. That they who had bruken to the Embassadors of a free City should be delivered up to it. But the Appollonians, when they were brought into their City, wisely considering they should gain more by Clemency and humanity than Revenge, sent them fair home again. This year each Consul triumphed twice. D. Junius the fifth of the Calends of October, Numenius Fabius the third of Nones of the same Month on the Saturnines, a people of Umbria. Again they triumphed over the Sallentines and Meffapians who had affliicted the Sallentines, Fabius on the Calends of February, Junius on the Nones. And this was the Conclusion of all their Italian Wars; For what was acted in Volscia next year, Quintus Fabius Gurgus the third time Consul, L. Mamilius Vitulus being his Colleague, was not so much a war against a hift enemy, as vengeance inflicted upon flames in behalf of their associates.

The Volscians, the richest people of all Etruria, did implore the Romans assistance against those who were formerly their serva. For by very ill and foolish advice (whether it were, that thereby they thought to increase their strength so much broken in the late wars, or that themselves trembling in delights were loath to trouble themselves with the labour of Arms,) they made their servants free of the City, and committed the Militia into their hands. Afterward they began to be chosen Senators, and to bear Offices of State. In short time oppressing the old Citizens, and usurping the whole power of the Commonwealth to themselves, they did most insolently exercise their Liberty against their Mella who gave it them. It was now grown common to Ravisa Virgins and honest Matrons by force, to heap Compliments and Indignities upon Parents and Husbands, crying for justice according to Law; and all things were confudely hurried according to the pleasure of the vilest most petulant Knaves. And that we may not pass over in silence arace Precedent, to what issue the healy-impiudence of flavish minds will proceed to when it hath gotten power, they made a Law, That the Liberties might have license of Conspilation with the wives and daughters of their Patrons, and that the Maidenhead of a Virgin designed in marriage to a true Freeman, should first be provisit to one of their Order. Wherefore the old Volscians being neither able any longer to endure these miseries, nor by their own power to repulse and avoid them, secretly confuling together, resolved to send Embassadors to Rome. They having by publice solicitations prevailed that the Senate would meet in some private house (for they law unavoidable ruin over their Heads if the business was known) they did by a very forcfull distrist to make them acquainted with their sad condition, wherewith the Fathers being moved to compasions, promised them assistance for the recovery of their lost Rights.

But these things which were thought to be agitated in secret, were by a Samaritaine discovered to the parties complained of; For he, a guest to the master of the houfe where the Senate met, being then sick, was by forgetfulness left in a place where he overheard all their discourse and betrayed it. Therefore the Embassadors, after their Return from Rome, were called into question, and the whole business being found out, were with other prime Men of the Cittie cruelly put to death. The Romans, now having a justice-caufe of War, sent 2 Fabius the Consul with an Army against them, whom, daring to encounter him in open field he put to flight, and flew a very great Number in the Pursuite: The Reill who betook themselves into their place of defence, he resolved with counter-wrotes to beleige. But they making strong resistance, The Consul (as there were frequent Pickering and light skirmishes) unawares venturing too far in the flight, received a wound whereof he dyed, which the besieged understanding, made a Sally with the greatest strength they could, hoping if they suddenly assaulted the enemy now in trouble for the los of the Consul, to force them to break up the siege. But the event of the battel was contrary, for being roughly received by the Romans, they were beaten in again with loss.

In this fight I suppose Dicelius Mus to have had the Command; for he might happily have been Fabius his Lieutenant, and after his death be chief in managing the War till a succesor was sent. And hence I conjecture it comes to passe that some negligent Historians have ascribed the Death of Dicelius Mus both the beginning and finishing of this War. Ca Cornelii L. F. Cn. N. 540, 54. C. 56 Blaflus and C. Marcus were created Censors that year, and this laft having before born the same Office, was from this his Magistracy called Concerus. The moderation of this Marcus was very remarkable, who being involv'd with Power which he sought not after, assembled the people together, and in a grave speech chid them, That they had twice intrusted that Office to the same man, whereas their forefathers did in this very consideration limit the time of it, because the power was too great. Hereupon a Law was made, That the same man should not be made Censor for the second time. The same year the number of the Quaestors was encreas'd; in former times there were but four, two for the City, and two to afflict the Consuls abroad in the Wars. But after ward
The Supplement of Livic, Book VI.

HAT Cartage was built by the Tyrians of Phenisia (besides the constant agreement of old Histories) the perpetual friendship of those Cities while they flourished, as also the manifest likeness both of their Language and Manners doth clearly testify. ’Tis reported that Elisa (who was likewise called Dido) the daughter of Agenor the son of Belus, flying out of her Country (by reason of the hatred the bore to her brother Pigmaleon for the unjust slaughter of her husband Sicelo) entred that Creek of Africa, and possest that Peninsula where Cartage was afterward built; her small beginnings promising little hopes of so great power and wealth as afterwards was obtained: For ’tis believed Dido purchased no more ground then might be compassed with the hide of a Bull or Ox, which being cut out into very slender thongs contained a larger space, then the sellers did imagine, and it was sufficient whereon to erect a Castle, which from thence is thought to be called Byrsa. Afterward seeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffick fake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men for rich and very gentle and quiet, they hearkned to the counsel sent from Utica (which was also a Colonie of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phenisians in recompense thereof should pay a yearly Tribute.

The work being finished, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Cartobas; the Greeks called it Carceno, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carthago. This City having Loving Neighbours, an Indtiligent people, and what was above all, a Wife Queen, did in a short time wonderfully increase. These things seeme to have been aedt some few years before the foundation of Rome; for about so ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. Jarchas a Petic King of some African Province, sought to marry her, threatening upon refual to raise war against her. But as she was averse from marriage by reason of her singular Chality and love of her former husband; so the very well understood that in these tender beginnings of affairs, a war would prove fatal and destructive; therefore taking time to deliberate, as if she had at length overcome her own Resolution, and were inclined to marry the African, caufed, a \textbf{Piles of wood to be erected before her intended marriage; whereon to sacrifice to the Infernal gods in behal of her husband Sicius:} And after many sacrifices offer'd, she did at length alched the pile, and killed her self with a sword the brought with her, her love to her Husband and Subjects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipp'd her as a Goddess, raising a Temple in the place where the lived calling her Dido, which in their language signifies a \\textit{Virtago}.

When after her death no man was thought worthy to succeed her in the Kingdom, the City be came to be governed by the Power of Nobles and Commons. The Name of Kings still remained, but they were like the Macedonian Kings; but that the honour was not to any Certaine families annexed, but conferred on any Prime Man who exceeded others in Virtue and Riches. Tho' he had the management of Wars abroad (whereof the Romans called them Pretours and Dictators, comparing their power with the usagio of their own Commonwealth) at home they were Princes of all publick Consultations, with their advice the affairs of the City were ordered: Things of heigheft concernment were referred to the people, their sentiment decided all controversie between the Kings and Senators: They also had authority to alter the Laws made by the Kings and Council, if they seemed contrary to the Publick, which any man had Liberty to question. Which too great power of the Commons being augmented to an intolerable height, by flattering Parasites and Orators, did in after time infinitely wrong and obftruct the Carthaginian affairs. Moreover in the Senate there were thirty of the more Antient appointed as a supreme Council, and these had greatest authority with all Men. There was likewise a Superinpector of Manners, invested with the same power as the Roman Censors, to maintain publick Decency and Discipline. In process of time, after many victories, their greatness being increas'd, they chose a greater Number of Commanders for the War: Among which \\textit{Mago}, the most Egregious both in courage and fortune, having left behind him two fons well educated and instructed in the art of Warre, and they also to their more numerous offspring, as it were by hand, delivering the same skill and knowledge, it was thought fit by some means to curbe the too great power of that family; to this purpose an hundred men were constituted to passe sentence upon the Generals themselves: Their power was very formable, as for the largeness of their Commission, so for the continuance, which was during life, whereas even the Kings now, were not for fo long a time but yearly created, whom at home they commonly called \\textit{Soffictes}, that is to say, Judges, much like to the Roman Consul. But when the \\textit{Censores} or hundred men behawed themselves with much influence, Hannibal by a Law reduced them into Order, it being decreed, \\textit{That the Judges should Yearly be chosen, and that no man should continue in office two years together.} Their gods and holy Rites they brought molt of from \textit{Tyris}, some they did afterwards add. \textit{Piso} they chiefly adore, and \\textit{Fornax} not a little, in whole honour they erected a Magnificent Temple in the City: \textit{Apollo} s house was likewise very rich, covered with plate of Gold, wherein was a famous statue which after the Ruine of Carthagin was carried to Rome and placed in the great Show-place called \textit{Circus Maximus}. But to \textit{Tyrus} every year sent a flap, with great care well trimmed, with the Tithes of their yearly tithes, and spoils gotten in War.

From the same Founders also they derived another molt horrid Rite, to offer an human sacriifice once a year to \textit{Sacrifone}, whom they called \textit{Belus}; the Relicks of which Barbarous Cruelty could not be quite abolisht by the Destruction of the City. The other Manners and Customs of the City were more civiliz'd by their conveniency of Commerce and Traffick, to which, by nature, and Education from their Forefathers much addicted, they did apply all their studies and Counsels. Hence by an unavoidable mischief the Love of Riches corrupt'd their Courts of Justice, made Vertue a servant to money, inflamed the Peoples minds with Covetousnes, and infected them with a forbid custom of Cheating and Lying, forcing the Commonwealth wholly to give it self up to these arts. In so much as it came to passe that as little Faith was had in Carthaginian Contracts and Covenants, so the chiefest part of the publick strength consist'd in ships, their Infantry the main support and pillar of all Empires, was had in no request, Their Horse very little: As often as they waged War by Land, they made use of Mercenaries, who had no true Love to the Commonwealth, whose faith was to be bought with money, their discord troublesome, and their conspiracies peregrious. Which error was so Capital, that before the utter destruction of the City, no other enemy but this did ever bring them so near to final ruine.

Neither did a lesser crop of mischief spring from this, That their Magistrates and Publick Officers did by mutual conveyance exercise Extortion and Purloin the face without punishment; so that this the leffe to be wonder'd, that a war arising between these two cities, the Romans proved conquerors, when as the Senators in all hard times added their wealth to the publick Stock, and the Carthaginians made a gain of the Commonwealth. But these vices grew up together with the City, so that at first being weak and little they were pretty well born withal, afterward for a while the greatness of their Empire, and the singular virtue of their Commanders made them the leffe tender, by whose means chiefly, I find, was both obtained and established the happiness that ever attend'd Carthage. Their first beginning in Arms was against the Africans, requiring Tribute for the ground the City was built on, neither could they extort that right out of their hands but by many battels: hereby they enlarged their Empire, and the belt planted part of Africa was reduced into subjection to them. Their command of the seas gave them fair fair opportunity of falling over into Sardinia and Sicily; the one was rude and Barbarous, not able to resit, into the other they were invited by its Beauty and Fertility, which was, by reason of the Inhabitants perpetual discord expos'd to the injuries of the most Potent. Out of Sardinia into Corsica their passage was short, and they did the more easily possess the Island as being not very rich.

But in Sicily for a long time they fought with various Fortune, obtaining many victories, and receiving many overthrows: Amilcar the son of Hanno when he had carried over three hundred thousand men, was vanquished by Gelo and flain. With which calamity being terrify'd, the Carthaginians did abstain from Sicily, till being call'd over by the Egetians, who were oppreFFed by the Selinuntians, they sent thither Amilcar the son of Geso the son of Amilcar; he destroying Selinuns and Himera, did again encrease the Carthaginians power in Sicily. Imilce did at sea vanquish Lepcis the brother of Dionysius the elder, and the Sicilians Admiral, he took and sunk an hundred ships, and flew above twenty thousand men, he surpriz'd many Cities, and took also part of Syracuse, but a sudden Peltitude arising which confounded most part of his Army, forced him to return home with very few men. Neither did they yet despair of gaining Sicily, but in few years after sent out Hanno with a fleet, commanding him to fight Dionysius. Afterward Magos being invited by Locris, when he was in the City of Syracuse it fell with three hundred thousand foot, he was call'd out by Timoleon; afterward the same Timoleon in a very great battle overcame Amilbal and Amilcar, having in their army seventy thousand men, and forced their Camps likewise. But they had not a quicker and greater turne of fortune in any war then in that against Agaclides, who being beaten in Sicily, besieged in Syracuse, having no manifee hopes of safety, did yet of his own accord carry the war over into Africa, where having overcome the Carthaginians in many battels, and cauld the Libyans every where to revolt, he brought them into very great danger and fear; and returning home again he expelld them clearly out of Sicily; till at length the death of the King, and the confusion which followed upon it, again gave them hopes, and opened them a way to regain possession. After this (as we have faid) they variably fought with Pyrrhus, proving at length to be the superiours.

In the mean time some Cities also in Spain became Tributary to them, whether being called to the affidtude of the Gades against some oppreFFing Neighbours, they sent relief to their Kinmen (for Gades likewise was founded by the Tyrians) and reduced some adjacent Regions of Spain into their own Jurisdiction. This was the posture the Carthaginians affairs were in when they took up arms against the Romans. But the Syracuseans and their King Hiero possesFed the greater part of Sicily which was not subdued by the Carthaginians; the residue was held by the Mamertines. They while they were in League with the Roman Legion at Rhegium, and could have affidtude from them, were not content to secure their own Territories, but invaded thole of the Syracuseans and Carthaginians, forcing many Cities to pay Tribute to them to avoid plunder, wastings of their grounds, and other incommodities of war. But when Rhegium was taken, and their companions worthily expected, being bereav'd of that help, they were not able to uphold their forces great & small; and having lost whatsoever they held out of Messana, were now at war with Hiero for the City it self. Concerning which King Hiero, I think it not convenient somwhat at large to discourse, because he in these times being first an enemy to the Romans, afterward for many years a companion and friend, was of very great moment in the settling of affairs. For in him was found singular happiness, great virtue, and most eminent wisdom; and in those days the power and state of Syracuse did with him flourish and with him fall.

This man not being help'd forward by any wealth or glory left by his Ancestors, owed all his fortune to himself, promis'd from a low estate to vast power, not as many, by accruing great men, or by the slaughter and banishment of his opposers, but by wonderful modesty both in attaining and in exercising his power, as well knowing there is no Kingdom so well and firmly establis'd, as that which is in such a manner order'd, that it more concerns the Subjects to fear the los of it then the Prince.

Having reigned therefore four and fifty years, in such a time when two most potent Cities on each hand did with most sharp contentions, fight for the dominion of the world, troub'd with no War abroad ( unleas in his first year) nor assaull'd by any Treacon at home, he died being above ninety years old, his fenes being at that age entire and his body found, as a certain argument of his Temperance, being not only beloved by his own people, but had in great Emption both with the Romans and Greekians, when he would often have divell'd himself of the Principality, the Citizens did openly prohibite him; And his son Gelon, who, at above fifty years of age, died before him, did all his lifetime, even to the last, with constant faith and obedience honour him, shewing a rare example of Moderation, in that he chose rather for ever to want a Kingdom then lose his Father. This Hieron was by his Father Hierocles (who derived his Pedigree from Gelon an antient Tyrant of Sicily) expos'd to the mercy of the world; forasmuch as he being a Noble man was fluxt to bring up a child which he had begotten on a servant. But being defev'ted of all human succour, the Bees for many days fed him, put honey into his mouth as he lay upon the ground. Hierocles being much affect'd with this Prodigie, and the aniewers of the Southfayers, who affirmed, That hereby Kingly power was pre-signified signified, took home the Infant, acknowledged it for his own, and in hopes of his future greatness took diligent care for his Education. As he was learning his book among his equals, "tis reported, that a Wolf suddenly appearing in the midst of the boys took his book out of his hand: when he first entred into the Wars, "tis said, An Eagle pitch'd upon his shield, and an Owle upon his spear; which was thought a signe of wisdom and strength, and by reason of the Kingly bird, of highest honour and dignity. But he himself shortly gave more certaine evidence, of being exceedingeomelitteness and strength of body, but much more illustrious and beloved for his wit, Temperance, Gentlenesse, Justice and Moderation; having often fought single Combats sometimes in the Battel, sometimes against private Challengers, he was always Victour, and by Pyrrhus frequently rewarded with many Military Gifts for his valour, and Pyrrhus his Kinwoman Neroes was afterward married to Gelos the son of Hiero. Pyrrhus being driven out of Sicily, when (according to the ill temper of those times) a diffusion arose between the army and Cite of Syracuse, Artemidorus and Hiero were, in the Camp near Menagia, by suffrage of the fouldiers chosen Commanders. By the advice of Hiero, and the help of his friends, some fouldiers being privily lented into the Cite reduced it into their Power; where Hiero shewed himself a gallant Man, and fit for the government of any Realme whatsoever; For, of the several factions which were therein, he neither flew nor banished any one Man, but by his clemence, Moderation and upright Counsell fo compounded their differences, that he was chosen Pretor of Syracuse with the good will and affection even of those against whom he came, as much as of those men who invited him thither. He with his whole heart as sincerely tending the publick good as his own (having observed an ill Culltome of a long standing in Sicily, That the General could no sooner lead his forces out of the City but there was either some sedition raised in the Army, or some innovation made at home) began to consult with himself, in whole hands to enthrall the City when he should be forced to go out to War. He married therefore the daughter of Lepcis, who was very popular, of great authority among the Citizens, of eminent honesty and faithful to his truit.

Having thus provided for Domettick affairs, he devised a remedy (very necessary indeed, but not altogether praiy-worthy) against the inofercy of the mercenary fouldiers: For drawing out his army against the Mamertines with such men, that met him near Centuripe, he order'd his battell near the River of the Cyromofians when they met, that he left a good distance between the Citizens and the Mercenaries, then commanding the Mercenaries to begin the fight, as if he and the City forces would on some other side charge the enemy while they were already busied. The Mercenaries by this means being surrounded by the greater number of Mamertines, were flain; himself (having thus employed the enemy) marched fair and fastly with his other forces to Syracuse.

Having in this manner purged the Army of those who were ill disposed and enclined to feditious, he diligently trained his City forces, hireth new Auxilaries, and now having the good-will of all (the most inofercy being removed, and the rest not daring to murmur) he order'd the Government according to his own pleasure. In the mean while, the Mamertines proud of their late victory and grown more fierce, rashly, and without fear invaded and spoiled the Syracusan Territories. Hiero now confiding both in the City and Army, forthwith marcheth out against them, and pitcheth his Camp near the enemies City, almost empty by reason of having sent out every way so many Troops. The Mamertines understanding the danger, suddenly return home to the relief of their City, with all their forces joyed. Hiero removing his Camp out of the Mamertine Fields, taketh the City of Mille, and in it fifteen hundred fouldiers, thence gaining by the way some Cattles, he marcheth to Amelcium (which is seated in the midst between Aegrium and Centuripe) which (though it were well fenced, and protected by a strong Garrison) he forced and demolished, the fouldiers he received into pay, and caufed to fight under him; the grounds he divided between the Centuripines and Aegrynians. Being animated with this successe, he again invaded the Mamertine Territories, taketh Aegrium upon composition, but the Abacenines and Tyndaris voluntary surrender themselves to him. He then took the Cities on each hand next to Messana on both the coasts subjext to Hiero, (for the Tindarians inhabited toward the Etrurian Sea, the Tauromenians, who were at this time in friendshipp with the Syracusans, toward the Sicilian Sea.) The Mamertines therefore being frighted, sent out their forces under the conduct of Cio their Pretor to oppose the enemy, who now was lodget near the River Longanus in the Mylen field. The battell being begun, and the fight along time doubtful, Hiero suddenly fending in fresh Troops upon the flank of the Mamertines, made the Victory his own. For before the fight Hiero had placed together two hundred Meffianis Exuls, valiant men, who hated the Mamertines, with four hundred choice men of his own Army, commanding them, To go about the hill Thorax, and by a sudden incurrion to fall upon the enemy on the other side, which they routy performing were the caufe why the whole Mamertine Army fell by the sword.

Cio, seeing all lost, and deiring nothing more then to dye, was taken prisoner, fore wounded, and conveyed into the Syracusan campe, finding the Prediction of the Entrailers and Southfainers true in another fene then he expected. For before the Battell the Prophets looking into the Intelettes of the sacrifice promis'd, He should lie in the Enemies Camp that night: Which he eftimating an argument of victory too late found himself deluded by another interpretation, with grief and sickness cast down, when the next day among other horses he espied that his son rode upon in the field, conjecturing thereby his death, he resolutely pulling the cloths and plasters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, understanding their overthrow, grew full of despair, and were now ready to present their humble supplication to the Conquerors, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the same time Hannibal, the Carthaginian Precursor, was in the Lipari Islands, which are adjacent to Sicily. He having intelligence of Hiero's victory, fearing left (the Carthaginians being utterly vanquished) the Syracusan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians, came suddenly over under pretence of congratulating with Hiero for his victory, and hinting him from directly marching to Messana, did himself make first entrance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only possess them with hopes of retaining their liberty, but left a strong Garrison of his own soldiers amongst them. Hiero understanding himself by this artifice deluded, & being not sufficiently prepared for a siege, made now more difficult, returned to Syracuse, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by an universal acclamation elevated King, which Title he afterward retained with the content both of the Citizens and others of the Island without.

When Hiero was retreated, the Mamertines having a little space of renewing confidence, began to deliberate upon their present condition, but were divided into two factions, some thought it not to be disputed, but that they should commit themselves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which as for many other reasons it was convenient, so having admitted their Garrison, was little less then necessary. On the other side, was said, 'The Carthaginians were no less enemies to the Mamertines than Hiero, that without doubt their purpose of defending the City was not out of good will, but desirous of Dominion; That of a long time they had aspired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were cast down from their bold hopes by loss of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own fate at home; That therefore without exception they must prove Vassals if they commit themselves to those who have so strong a Navy, and possess greater part of Sicily it self. That 'tis therefore no way expedient to desire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them than they could bear from the Syracusans. If the Punick Garrison came only with intent to preserve the City from Hiero, they may now upon fair terms be dismissed, having done the work: But if they have some other Clandestine design, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendship. That they should rather implore assistance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unquestionable faith and sincerity, who will have neither occasion nor necessity of keeping Messana under their jurisdiction, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily, nor any use of sea affairs, and consequently taking no care therein. That they would abundantly consent to keep Italy secure from Hiero and the Carthaginians, having made Messana strong as an obstacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they should continue to rely upon the Roman faith and the other Nation; that indeed they could neither without bullet or any convenience change their former counsels, having already sent Embassadors and obtained hope of succor and relief. For as for the Mamertines before their last battle with Hiero, beginning then to distrust in their own strength had craved assistance of the Romans as their Kinmen, and the people being perplexed by the Confuls who were defirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid should be sent to them; but the Senate out of shame to be counted authors of the business, did defer it. For they who had lately so severely punished their own Legion for the wicked surprise of Rhegium, if they should now assist the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the mastery of Messana, they saw they should clearly lose the reputation of their Justice and Fidelity, which by their former act they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow, and not doubting but if they were forsoaked by the Romans, they would apply themselves to the Carthaginians, with one content they ordained to lend them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as foreseeing that otherwise Messana quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it when once came to pass, they should be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own possessions in Italy.

For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reason of the infafluous desire of Rule in those who are potent, as by the convenient situation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long track between the two seas from the Liguarians and Venetians, to the Bruniants, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that the Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the sea, whether the grounds being low were easily overthrown, or whether some earthquake or strength of the Tides cut off the Ilemus. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhegium, because things which are broken, are by some fuch word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the first inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are said to have built a City on the adverse shore over against Italy, which because it was feituate in a Creek of the sea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I believe, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancle, both those words in the several Languages signifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Island, Which was by many called both Zancle and Sicilia.
This Island far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulness of soil, yielding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the belt, adorned with many, and those very great Cities, even to wonder, and if you consider the Commodity of the Havens, and Situation of the whole Island, there is scarce to be found in the world a place more fit for the chief seat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary part it looketh toward Africa, on another side lyeth Sardea, and on exit it hath Peloponnesus devided from Greece by the Ionian sea: On every hand the voyage is short, and the passage easy for ships whether bound outward or homeward. And truly, though other reasons were alleviated, yet the only caule of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, without doubt, the great desire each of them had to be Masters of this Island. The Romans found fault, that the Carthaginians contrary to the league had affixed the Tartessians; the Carthaginians on the other side charged them, for having entered into Confederacy with Hiero against them. But to fix a great a power were now both thefe Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided, but that at some time or other for some cause they must needs find occasion to fall out. For as Trees planted at no great distance, for a while do not much hinder one the other, but being grown to some bignesse bereave one the other of Juice and nourishment from the earth, and at full growth enterwinding with both root and branches mutually destroy one the other: So rising Empires cannot long be at Amity and friendship, but, in lawlowing up what is interjacent between each others Domains, desire to try the superiority between themselves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition or to enlarge their Territories without removing all Opponents.

To these causes may be added the great power the Comminality had in each City, together with their earnest desire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar fort did much prevail, and now in the encrease of their City, growing rich by many Commodities, were willing for gains sake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different, for having in the former wars sustained damage in their estates, they hoped by the riches of Sicily to recompenfe themselves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their sentence who perjured the war. Hence a-appearing the Conful being commissioned (whereas otherwise the major parte of the Senate had attented, over-powering the votes of those who would to old Rules) without delay fenth Claudius CTONs, Tribunes of soldiers beforehand with some few ships, to observe an opportunity, and if any were offered, to walt over into Sicily. When he was come to Rhegium, not daring to hazard his ships because he saw the seas obstructed with a greater fleet of Carthaginians, he entered into a Thiberians vessel and crossed over to Messana; there discoursing with the Mamertines as the present occasion required, being ready to over come the contradiction of the Carthaginians, he returned without having done his business. But awhile after understanding there was a difference at Messana, some pleading against the Roman assistence, the greater part bearing ill will to the Carthaginian Garrison, he again crossed the sea, and among other things to the present purpose told them, 'Hic dum est, non esse in libertate, the Carthaginians answer a, your Romans, not trouble themselves for the liberty of a City which was under their jurisdiction, the Carthaginians had already out of their good will taken care that the Mamertines should not be compell'd to be subject to the Carthaginians: That therefore he might depart, or else gave some other reason of his being at Messana. Claudius denied, The City was free so long as a Foreign Garrison continued therein; every other pleasure.'

To this when no man returned any answer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, Tois plaus, faid he, by this general peace, that the Carthaginians cause is unjust, and that the Mamertines are desirous of liberty, otherwise neither would they be forborne to justify their own Right, and the same; if they conferred with the Carthaginians, having no cause to dissemble, would freely and openly put their minds. At this there arising a kind of a noise in the assembly, many prating his speech as true, and indeed agreeing with their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for the present, sufficiently moved the Mamertines and tried the disposition of their minds) went back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ships, he attempted to pass over, but being much inferior to the Carthaginian Commanders, both in number of vessels, and skill in sea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a sudden storme arising, he returned to his port, having lost some ships, and hardly faving the Rest. But being nothing ternished with this misadventure, he new triennion his ships, resolving upon a better opportunity once more to make trystal of Fortune: When behold messengers came from Hannu (Governour of the Mamertine Garrison, and Guardian of the seas) bringing with them all the ships and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the former fray: Hannu's design here was to cast all the blame of the breach of Covenants upon the Romans, he therefore also complained, That they had by force attempted to fall in those seas which were in the possession of the Carthaginians; and furthermore perjured them to have a great care of preferring peace and maintaining the league.

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unless they would withdraw their forces out of Messana, and that again he endeavoured to cross the sea, he vaunted, That he would not offer the Romans so much as to wash their hands in that sea. Nevertheless he could not prevent Claudius, who offering the Nature of the sea, laid hold of an opportunity when the wind happily helped the Tide, and arrived in Sicily without opposition. There calling a Council of those Mamertines he found in the Haven, he persuaded them, To call Hannover to them, as if they had some business at present to consult with him about. For Hannover, not much confiding in the Townsmen's doubtful minds, had with the fouldiers posseffed the Caffle, neither was he willing to trust himself in any of their Assemblies: Yet fearing if he betrayed his Diffidence he might encrease their complaints, and by his absence give them occasion to join with the Romans, he came to discourse with them, where the time being fpan out with difputations and wrangling, the Romans, with the Mamertines their approbation, laid hands on him and caft him into prison. So being circumvented by craft, and frightened with menaces, when no other condition would be accepted, he was compelled to reftore the Mamertines their Caffle, and draw away his Garrison. The Carthaginians upon intelligence of the busineffe, were above measure exasperated, and (whereas otherwife they used to punish their Commanders for evil counsels though they prospered) exclaiming both againft the folly and cowardize of Hannover, miserably crucified him, and immediately fent both fea and land forces to Messana with another Hannover, the Ion of Hannibal, to order affairs in Sicily: He drawing his forces together at Lipara, marched to Selinum, where pitching his Camp, he left his foot army and went to Agrigentum, and (having fenced the Caffle there) he drew the people, being friends to the Carthaginians, into arms againft the Romans: From whence being returned to his Camp, Embaffadors came to him from Hiero, who being no whit content with the Romans arrival into Sicily, thought this the fitteft fea-reafon wherein joyning forces for a time with the Carthaginians, both they and alfo the Barbarians in posfeflion of Messana might be driven out of Sicily, Having therefore had discourse with the Carthaginian General, they eafily agreed to enter into confederacy againft the Romans, who had fupplantated both to their equal loffe, each of them having failed of their hopes of Messana: "twas ordered they fhou’d joyfully besiege Messana, and suffer no part of Sicily to be fubjed to any power but the Carthaginians or Syracusans. So the Carthaginian Commander with his whole fleight moved against the Mamertines, having first fent an Herald to charge the Romans, if they would be ferved friends of the Carthaginians to depart Messana, and within a time prefixed to quit Sicily. The ships were commanded to keep their flation about Pelorat, the foot army fortified their Camp at a place not far from Messana, called Cunibla, in the Greek townque Eorul. Hiero likewise, according to agreement, came with his Syracufan Army, and laid siege to the other side, about the Hill Chalcidice, to the Cote, being round begirt, could not safely receive succour either by land or fea.

About the fame time, when the Herauld brought back no peaceful anfwer from Messana, the Carthaginians, partly out of anger, partly out of diftrust, cruelly put to death all their Mercenary fouldiers which were Italians by Nation. Thofe things were no fooner heard at Rome, but the Conful Appius was forthwith fent with a strong Army to Rhegion, thence he fent fome before, to treat with the Carthaginians and Syracufans breaking up the fiegé, in the mean time, feeing the feamen of Troyan guile, he was very folicitous and intent in contriving how to prevent any fuch further attempts; The Conful's Embaffadors brought back no friendly anfwer from the Carthaginians, but were by Hiero with an accurate ordination ftrapply reprehenfed, he firft having recounted the many good offices he had done the Romans, proceed faying, 'I am in doubt, Romans, whether I fhould grieve for my felf or for you; I indeed have lofT friends of you somewhat worse then I took you to be, but ye have loft that Reputation of Julitce and Inceftity for which ye were fo famous among all Nations. With the Mamertines ye never had any friendship or Society, ye had heretofore League with the Carthaginians, and lately entered into one with Me. Being now willing to breake these Leages, can ye give an account, by what injury from us, or merit of the Mamertines ye are therein provok'd? But because the Carthaginians are able to fpeak for themselves, omitting what concerneth them, I fhall at prefent put you in mind of things in refence to my felf alone. The Mamertines your good Country men, did, as you know, receive pay under the Syracufan Banners, and being difmiffed for their Returne for Italy; after they had been entertained as friends and Companions by the poore credulous Messenians, committed a moft horrid fae, as hath not been remembered by man, flaying in the night time their Land-lords, and keeping in their own power, their goods, wives, children and the Cite itfelf. Which unleffe your felves (being of the fame opinion with other men) had judged to be a moft vile and execrable villany, you would not fo severely have punished the fame fae fact of the Campanians committed upon the Rhegians, by the Mamertines Example. By the fame indignity therefore wherewith ye were moved to take revenge of wicked villanies, by the fame am I moved not to let the Mamertines go unpunifhed, espe-iously feeming they have fince committed fo many Robberies almost all Sicily over, burying as it were the memory of their firit offence with others afterward committed. For (to omit other things) in that they deftoyed the Cities of Camarina and Gela, then under the Syracufan protection, is reason sufficient why I fhould with a full and pious War profeff the boldneffe of fuch moft impudent Men. If ye therefore undertake to defend them because, being born in the fame Italy, they are as it were your kinmen, how much more juftly might you have fpared the Rhegians which were your fellow-Citizens? When in the taking of Rhegion I helped you with Auxiliaries and Provisions, how fhould I poflibly then Divine that ye would hereafter hinder when I should upon as just causes believe Messana? But what need I of many words? if you have any care left of your reputation and faithfulness, if any sense of honesty, at last if any shame, I sought not to doubt but that you will with your forces rather affiit me in my just cause then oppose me. But if the consideration of these things seem light unto you, however the event of war be doubtful, 'tis most certain all the world will plainly understand, 'That the Romans were incited to bare arms against us, not out of any colour of Justice and Equity, not by any injuries received (for that ye can no way pretend) not out of any pity or good will to the Mamertines, but merely by their own ambition, and inordinate desire of adding this noble Island to their Empire.

When this answer was returned, Appius having observed that to shew a Navy guarding the passage could not without manifest danger crost over, plotted a very subtil and cunning device, he said, He did by no means desire that Hiero should be alienated from the Romans, that the war was not decreed against him, neither could be prosecuted without the people command. And at a trucmgem day therefore appointed he commanded his Sea-men to be ready, having their ships prepared for the voyage as if he would fail home. Now he was not ignorant that there were many both Carthaginian and Syracusan fooldiers in the Rhegian Fort, under the pretence of being Merchants, by whom he thought this news would quickly be conveyed to those who would have it true. And it hapned accordingly as he had foreseen, for he no sooner had entred into his ships on a clear Sun-shine day, and sailed along the Italian shore, but presently news was carried to the Carthaginian fleet which guarded the seas, whereupon they now not fearing the enemy would make any attempt that way, left the passage open, failing their shorely alike whether it pleased them. The Conful, who had forethought it would to come to pace, feared his course backward in the night time, and arrived in Sicily with his whole Navy, no body so much as observing, much less hindering his coming.

It was a bold Enterprize and full of hazard, for an army unskillful in sea-affaires, in the night time, blindly to venture with rude and illbuild ships through a sea dangerous in itself, though it had been dark, nor any enemy to be feared. And the exploit was thought worthy to be made known to posterity, by a new Cognomen thereupon given to the Conful. For, because he made use of ye vessells, made of the Trunks of trees, for the transportacion of his fooldiers, he was, in admiration of the fact, by the simplicity of that age, named Caudea, which signifieth the trunk of a tree. For the Roman having no use of sea affaires, had neither any covered ship or long boate, or good skiff in a businesse of such concernment as this was; but made use of those Triremes which the Tarentines and Locrians had lent the Eleats and Neapolitans, together with little vesells of Trafick of fifty Oars. But Appius landing not far from the place where the Syracusans had pitched their Camp, encouraged his fooldiers and declaring to them, The Vittory would be certain if they came upon the Enemy unawares, immediately proceeded to assault their Camp. Hiero being awakened with the sudden tumult, marched out with what forces were ready. for a time the fight was very sharp, the Roman fooldiers were beaten back, but the Legions stoutly standing in it. Hiero was overthrown, and with his men fearfully retreated into his works. Appius having command unto the Land, determined to be plunder'd, entred into Messana, freeing the Mamertines from great fear, and filling them with better hopes for hereafter. Hiero seeing himselfe beaten before he could see the enemy (as himselfe afterwards confessed) and suspecting that the Carthaginians had betrayed the passage over the sea, when he had revolved many things in his doubttul mind, began to be in fear of the main chance, and in the dead time of the night he drew his army out of their Trenches, and marched directly without halting to Syracusa. When he was gone, Appius thought it to make use of the terror of his late Victory in vanquishing the Carthaginians also, and having ordered his fooldiers to refresh themselves in time, marched out in the dawning of the day to assault the Carthaginian Camp, which was pitched in a very safe place, by nature and art diligently fenced, for on one side the sea, on the other side deep Marshes and Bogs enveloped it in the form of a Peninfula: That narrow space of ground where was passage to firm land was fenced with a strong wall against all assaults. Here the Roman sooldiers beginning the storm, could not prevail against the strength of the place and multitude of enemies, but being beaten back with darts and stones (as in the form of a City) they were forced to retire without having done their work.

Many times it happened in war that ill success in the beginning giveth occasion of better fortune, while they who are worrited endeavour with better advice and more courage to make up their loffe, and the enemy on the other side being bewitched with a flattering opinion of felicity, and taking no heed against future chances, are carried away with rathaness. as at this time it came to pass to the Carthaginians, for they not being content to have repulsed the enemies, illured out of their Camp and pursued them as if they had fled, thinking the Romans had yielded not so much to the difficulty of the place, as to their virtues and courage. When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were slaine, some fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about, neither durst they any more for out of their Place Camp as long as Claudius was at Messana. The Conful, considering the nature of the place and difficulty of its situation, thought it no wisdom to make a second assault, and seeing his time to be spent in vain thereabouts; leaving a strong garrison at Messana. Invaded the Territories of the Syracusans and their Confederates; and having without opposition wasted the Grounds, he conceived such confidence, that he marched up with his army even to Syracus; itself: Where the Battel was very doubtful, and at one time the Consul was in great danger, and had certainly been surrounded and taken, had he not suddenly betook himself and fent to Hiero, to treat on Conditions of peace. Hiero likewise sent a friend of his to consult about the business, and the difcourage being on purpose drawn out in length, the Consul had time to bring his men into a place of greater security: The Syracusans likewise following the same example, had many treaties of peace with the Romans, and indeed an agreement had been made, but that Hiero was unwilling to be the author thereof. In these affairs the greater part of the year was spent; then the Consul returned to Messana, where leaving some forces to protect the Mamertines, with the rest of his men he crossed over to Rhegium: From thence he went to Rome to his Triumph which he made, over the Carthaginians and Hiero King of Sicily, with great joy of the People, as being the first over a Foreign Nation. This was the flight of the Romans designes by facts, and such was the success of their undertakings in Sicily. But these things and the actions of following times are much corrupted by the ambition of writers, the chief whereof, Philius Agrigensis, and Fabius Pilor, the one striving to advance the Carthaginians Glory, the other the Romans, they both neglect their duty, and the truth of History:
Whole Leytivy Polybius deferredly reprehends. For if even in private causes it be held an accurr-ced crime to circumvent any one by false Testimony, the author of an history is certainly to be esteemed more foully pernicious if he corrupt the acts of Princes and Commonwealths with fal-thood: He ought to value truth more than any earthly Commodity or his own life, and the lefe deferte pardon in that he cannot allege so much as any faire pretence for his Lyes, for if he durft not for some causes freely speake all he knew, he might certainly without danger have held his Tongue. While Claudius in Sicily vanquitheth Hiero and the Carthaginians, the Romans, who had not put off the ffaith of fervants, and reverence toward their masters, he distributed into severall feants round about.

This war was likewise thought worthy of a Triumph, which the Consul made in the Calends of November, over the Volitains. While the fame Consuls were in office a Lustration was performed by the Cenfor, Cn. Cornelius and C. Marcius, and there were required the names of two hundred ninety two thousand, two hundred twenty and four Citizens; a very great and almost incredible number to one who shall confider how many were loft in the wars, which hardly ever ceased from the foundation of the City; and how many were also fo followed up by the Pilfeine and Malignant defeases as raging as the war itself. Now indeed the Commonwealth was made invincible and not to be overcome by any clamour or slaughter whatsoever, by the wise advice of Romullus (which was constantly obserued by pofterity) in daily admitterg new people into the City, in muchne that neither all the losses received by Polybius, nor their many ship wrecks in the first Punick war, nor the fights of Thrasocris and Carne in the second, were able to much to affift it, but that still the did rise more cheerful, free and valiant out of all her troubles.

But in Greece the Lacedemonians who were also very famous for their Discipline and Valour in war, not any whit inferior to the Romans, because they forbade strangers to coinhabitt with them, were not long able to uphold their Dominion, nor long after to maintain their Freedom; when in the Leuctrian battell they loft not much more then a thousand men, their Empire pre-fently fell to the ground; and at Selinus with the loss of not quite fix thousand, their Liberty was taken away. But the Athenians, inhabitants of the fame Peloponnesus, admitting freely any neighbours into equal privileges with themselves, did confirute a very fair and flourishing Commonwealth, and likely to have continued, had not fome few of them, to their own and their Countries deftruction, madly provoked the Romans, whole power then was grown formidable to all people. Such divers events are necessarly conuenent to divers institutions: For as in nature it is agreeable, that those bodys who are to a compebnt measure daily refтренished with whoU-me food, should be stronger and longer lived then those who content with their own natural ingenite moisture defpite all nourishment from without: so it stands to reason, that those Cities should better flourishe, who admit into themselves and make their own what in any other place they find to be excellent, then thofe, who by a foolish arrogancc, defparing whatsoever growth not in their own foil, deprive themselves of many good aaffhants in obtaining and preferving their power and sovereingnty.

This year gave a beginning to a cruel custom, which afterward was frequently and moft in-temperately fuperfited, That the blood of man shou'd become a publicke spectacle of pleasure, bearing profously for the fake of any mean and wanton spectator. The authors of this barbarcous vylum were M. and D. furenti Bruttii, who by a ftrange kind of piety, intending to ho-honour the Afles of their dead father, did with great favour of the Citizens exhibit a Fencing-Shew. But this injury to mankind was moft fervely revenged by a Pellicence, which all this and
and the next year did furiously rage. Concerning which when they had consulted the books of the Sybils, 'twas found the anger of the gods was the cause thereof. These affuring therefore a suffocation that their Religious affairs were not rightly handled, the Priests by diligent observation and investigation, found that many Chappels and Temples were converted into the use of private men, and that Caprum, a Veilal Nun, was guilty of Incest: she prevented her doom by hanging herself, but he who had corrupted her, together with those thievants who were privy to the fact, were executed according to Law. The holy places were redeemed out of private hands to their wonted use. So having cleared the City in matters of Religion, the Fathers applied their minds again to the care of the Commonwealthe; and because Eturia being appealeth, there was no communion in Italy, they ordered both the new Conuls to be sent into Sicily with the Legions into M. Valerius Maximus the eldest son of Marcus, who in the mean time the office was called Meffula, and M. Otho Silvius Crassus, C.F., M.N. These having safely transported their forces were attended with the fame good fortune. For when after their taking the City of the Adranites by Storm they had laid siege unto Centurius, there came Embassadors to them from the Alcinians, offering to deliver up their town. Thence the Conuls, marching through several parts of the Island, sometimes with their force, joined, sometimes aunder, as they faw cause, overcoming both Carthaginian and Syracusan, as often as they durst flend to the hazard of a Battle, spread their fame and Terrour round about: And such was their happinesse in following their fortune, and fo great their force, that in a while after they were reckned fifty six Cities which had committed themselves to their Protection, in which number were the Tauromentinians and the Caraganians: Out of which Cities the Conuls leaving what Auxiliaries they pleas'd, did daily increase in strength, and, pitching the Camp nearer unto Syracuse it self, consulted about the siege of it. Which thing Hiero maturely considering, when he began to distrust in his own and the Carthaginian Forces, and withal thought the Romans were belted to be trusted, he resolved to enter into League with the Romans; and in order therunto sent Embassadors to the Conuls to treat of Peace. Neither were the Romans at all averse from making friendship with Hiero to separate him from the Carthaginians, especially because thereby they might more easily supply their Legions with Corne for food. For the Carthaginians having command of the seas, they could not have Provision from Italy, by which incommodity the former Conuls reaped more trouble then from the enemy. But, when Hiero was once united to them, the Kingdom of Syracuse being very fruitful, would plentifully afford all the Necesaries. The Peace therefore was concluded on these Articles, That what places or prifoners Hiero had taken from the Romans or their allies should be return'd without ransom, and likewise pay an hundred talents of silver; that he should without molestation reign over Syracuse and all Cities under the Syracuse Jurisdiction, the chief whereof were Are, Leonism, Megara, Eorbus, Neini, Tauromentinium. The Embassadors being thence sent to Rome, the fame Conditions were there confirmed, and the Senate decreed that Peace should be maintained with that King, and after a few days Ca. Afinae, Catilina, Crassus propounding it to the people, they likewise affented. This League, being made for fifteen years, was perpetually kept enviable: Hiero bearing much Respect to the men Greatnesse and they so bountifully requiring his good affection, that neither of them had a mind to repent of their friendship. Hannibal the Carthaginian, being come as far as Xibonius with his sea forces, to raise the siege of Syracuse, having intelligence of the Peace, returned with greater hift than he came. The Romans being now strengthened by Hiero their associate and fellow foilder, made no delay, but quickly reduced many Cities from the Carthaginian Jurisdiction. From Adrars, a fenced village, and Messina, after many days siege they returned without effecting their Purpose. But the Segelians they received into protection, when they had flaine the Carthaginian Garrisson and voluntarily revolted to them: Among other Confradurations, they said they Loved the Romans for Kindred sake, deriving their Pedigree from Aniues after his flight from Troy. And not long after the Alienzans came into the Romans: But at Hilarus, Tersius and Metela they were faine to use force and Engines, and therefore dealt the more severely with the vanquished party. Whereupon the Tydardians being terrifyed, seeing themselves next to danger, and help far from them, Entred into Conflabation about yielding themselves to the Romans, but were prevented by the Carthaginians; for they, feting what was in hand, fent away the chief of the Cite as Holderas to Libyeum, and took in good fortune of Corne, wine and other provisions. About this time the feverity of Ottacilius Crassus the Conul was of much advantage to the Roman Discipline, for those fouldiers who were taken by Himbad, had safely, for safeguard of their lives, submitted themselves to bondage, he cau'd to continue without the Camp to receive the firit charge from the enemy, that fo, having no fencce but their own courage, they might be the more valiant, trufiting only in their own courage, and not to any security of the place they flood in.

After these and other exploits of no greater moment, winter now approaching, the Conuls disposing severall Garrisons in convenient places, returned into Italy and to Rome with the residue of their Armies. There was a Triumph decreed to M. Valerius (who made success and pins had been most remarkable) over the Carthaginians and Hiero, which was performed the sixteenth of the Calends of April. Among the spoils was brought a Clock, which is therefore taken notice of, because it was the first which was seen at Rome, it was taken at Catina, and by Valerius placed upon a Pillar in publick near the Roftra: He also on the side of the Court built by Hostilius set up a Table, whereon was painted the Battel wherein he overcame Hiero and the Carthaginians, which before his time was not done by any man, but afterward by many. This Valerius had his Surname Metella from Melissa; but I wonder that some Authors of no small note should imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the feries of affairs both evidently demonstrate, that it rather proceeded from his delivering that City from the troubles it suffered (after Appius Claudius his departure) from the Carthaginians and Hiero, removing the one enemy and reconquering the other.

In the mean while the Pellence still raging, a Dictator was named for the knocking in of a Nail, who was Cn. Fulvius, Cn. F. C. Maximus Centumalius, he chose for Maller of the Horla. Q. Marcius, Q. F. Q. Philippus. In the same year the Aefernian Colony was planted, whereas the year before one was deduced to Firmum, or as some will have it to Caflum. After this L. Polyaemus, L. F. L. N. Megellus, and Q. Mamilius, Q. F. M. N. Vitulus were created Consuls, and both of them had Sicily allotted for their Province: There were but two Legions allowed them, which were thought sufficient, because now having Amity with Hiero the war was more easie; they considered likewise that provisions would be the better procured if the Army were but small. The Consuls having transported their forces into Sicily, and being joyed with their associates, passing by things of lesser moment, thought fit with their whole strength to besiege Agrigentum, which City the Carthaginians had plentifully furnished with all manner of accommodations, intending it for the Magazine of their wars. For they seeing Hiero had forfaken them, and that the Romans made Sicily their chiefest care, they thought it behooved them to make the more diligent preparation for the war. In the first place therefore they sent the greater part of their forces into Sardina, to lie in wait against the Italian shore, by that means to divert the Romans from Sicily, or at least to compel them to fend the smaller forces then otherwise they would have done.

But being frustrated of their hopes (for the Romans had strength sufficient, both wherewith to guard their own Coasts, and invade Sicily with a new army) they hired many Mercenary fouldiers of the Ligurians and Gauls, but more out of Spain, whom, together with great plenty of provisions, they sent to Agrigentum; resolving to make that their Magazine of Corne, and the Receptacle of their Armes, being, by reason of its conveniency of situation, and multitude of buildings, fitter for such occasions then any other City of Sicilie of their Jurisdiction. The onely feas of War therefore being about that Citie, the Romans, having confin- ed the Carthaginians within their works, pitched their Camp within a mile thereof. The grain was then ripe in the fields, and because they foresaw the siege would prove long, the fouldiers sent out to reap and bring in Corne, wandered somewhat too far and more careless then ought to have been done having an enemy fo near. The Carthaginians omitted not to make use of this occasion, and had indeed given a great overthrow to the Romans, but that they regained as much by their courage, as they had lost by their negligence. For, when they who were sent out to forrage were not able to reft the affault of the Enemy, the Carthaginians purfued them even to the Camp, where defiving their forces, some prepared to forrome the works, while the others maintained the fight with the guards without. Then, as often at other times, the Laws of warfare duly observed and the incorrupt forest Rigo of the Roman Discipline fave them from an hazard tending to the destruction of their whole army. For (it being a deadly crime among the Romans for any cause whatsoever to forfake their fiation) the guard without, knowing it was no poupoe to fly back, though they were much overpowred in number, maintaine the fight with wonderful courage, loosing many of their own men, but killing more of the enemies, till the Troupes had time to arm themselves and come to their Relief, to the Enemy being there repulfed, and those who had now almoft entred the works surrounded, the Romans made a very great slaughter of them, and pursu'd the reft even to the Citie. This accident made both the Enemy more fearfull of IFuing out, and the Romans more wary in their Forrage. Henceforth the heat of their Contention being not fo great as before, (for the Carthaginians seldom made a fall, and then only in manner pickeering and light skirmishing) the Romans thought fit to divide their forces, and plant their Camps on both sides of the Citie, on the one side near to Heraclea, his Temple, on the other in the high way leading to Heraclea. Their Camps were fenced with Trenches on both sides, toward the Citie, against their Sallies, and toward the Country both to secure themselves from any invasion, and to hinder Relief from entering the Citie. The space between the two Camps was guarded with many companies of fouldiers.

In all these affaires they were much assisted by the Sicilians, who lately had made friendship with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thousand. They brought provisions as far as Efetius, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans fetched it into their Camp. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Necessaries. At this flay the siege continued for almost five moneths, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmishes) till at length the Carthaginians began to have the worst on't. For a great number of men, little lefs then fifty thousand warers, having been so long shut up in one town, had spent almost all their corn, and saw no likelihood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the passages, so that they were much affifted both with their present mi-fere, and expectation of future. Therefore Hannibal the son of Gesco (who was Commander in chief at Agrigentum) by many messengers craving relief against hunger and other dangers, Hanno the elder was sent into Sicily with some Elephants and Souldiers which were for that purpose rais'd. His Army consisted of fifty thousand foot, six thousand horse, and three thousand Elephants, with which forces he failed to Libyachs, thence he marched to Heraclea, whither forthwith, with some messengers promising to deliver up Erbesius to him: Being by their means made master of Erbesius (from whence the Romans hitherto had all their provisions) he seemed to have effected a business of great moment, as much afflicting the Romans now for want of necessaries as they had done the Agrigentines.

And now the Romans began to consult about raising the siege, which they were very near giving over for a desperate business, had not the King of Stracche, by trying all ways, made a shift by flesh and to convey to them some corn and other commodities, whereby their present want was in some measure relieved. Hanno considering the Romans now to be faint with hunger and other infirmities following it, whereas his own men were well and lusty and in perfect strength, approached near the Romans, resolv'd, if occasion were offered, to fight them. Marching therefore with his fifty Elephants, and whole army from Heraclea, he sends his Numidian horsemen before to play about the enemy Camps, to provoke the Roman horsemen, and, if possible, to draw them out into ambush. The Numidians according to order carelessly flying about the Conful's Camp, the Romans issue out, beat back those who opposed, and pursued them as they fled out of order, that way which they knew Hanno to be coming. The further they followed the pursuit, the more difficult was their return to their own works, insomuch that many of them were lost after they had met with fresh forces, which cau'd them who fled likewise to turn and fight. Hanno being by this much encouraged with hopes of the main Victory, placed himself upon an hill called Taurus, about a mile and a half distance from the Roman Camp; nevertheless the battle was deferred longer then was expected between two Armies to near one the other; sometimes the Carthaginian, sometimes the Roman unwilling to hazard their whole fortune in one battle, while Hanno was desirous to fight, the Romans contained themselves within their Trenches, because they were exceeded by the enemy both in number and carefullness, being themselves terrified and dejected with the loss their horsemen had sustained.

But when they (seeing their associates troubled and daunted at this their fear, the Enemy on the contrary grow more confident, and thinking it better to fight with the Carthaginians then enquire such want) were resolved upon the Battel, then Hanno began to fear, and decline the encounter. Two months were thus spent, nothing of greater moment being performed, but light skirmishes which happened every day. At length, being moved with frequent entreaties from Hannibal, who had daily sent out Messengers, and by lighted fires given him often notice, that the besieged were no longer able to endure hunger, and that many were thereby compelled to flee to the enemy; Hanno was resolv'd no longer to defer the battle, giving order to Hannibal at the same time to issue out of the City. The Confuls having intelligence hereof, kept themselves very quietly within their Camps; Hanno the more curiously presented himself in Battel array, marcheth up to their very Works, boldly provokes them to fight, reproaching them with fear and cowardize. They on the contrary being content to repulse the enemy from their Trenches, neither ranged battel against them while they flood, nor pursued them when they retreated. When things had been thus transacted for some days togethers, and the Carthaginians were fully perswaded the Romans durst not venture on any further action, L. Posthumius the Conful widely made use of the enemies security and contempt to his own good. For silently ordering his whole battel within the works, when the Carthaginians according to their enticements came up to the works, he issued out with a few and held them in action with light skirmishes from day break till noon, then the enemy withdrawing themselves, he brought forth his Legions and made a charge upon them.

Hanno, though he saw a necessity of fighting contrary to his expectation, hauing entirely into battel, maintained it doubtful till the day was almost spent. But the Romans, having on purpose well exercised their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not so much troubled with heat, thirst and Labour as were the Carthaginians, who, before the battel, being weary with fasting and standing all day, the longer they fought, were the lesse able to resist by reason of the weakness of their Bodys. At length the Mercenary fouldiers who stood in the front were no longer able to endure the brunt, and did not only give back themselves, but falling in disorderly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind them, routed the whole battel and caused them to fly before the enemy who so hotly charged them. Things were managed with the same success in the other place, for Hannibal, issuing out to fight, was beaten back with the greater loss, and forced into the City again. The Carthaginian Camp was taken, three Elephants wounded, thirty f lain, eleven came alive into the Romans hands: The men had the same fortune, for of fo great an Army very few escaped with their General to Heraclea, they who were shut up in the City, seeing no way or means of safety left them, were afflicted with very great terror and despair: When Hannibal following the bell cou'd his ill fortune had left him, observing that the Romans, what with weariness of their late fight, and joy of their Victory, kept not their guards so strict as heretofore, about the third watch of the night went out of the Town with his Mercenaries, and having crossed the Trenches filled up with boats stuffed with
He gave not much Credit to a Runegado, yet thinking it a buginice not to be neglected, did lend a Choice Brigade of Souldiers upon the Design; the Gauls came accordingly as they had been received by Hannibal, and the Romans suddenly arising out of ambush to receive them, there was between them a very fierce and cruel fight, wherein every one of the Gauls were slain, and because they died not unrewarded, Hannibal was doubly pleased, both that he was rid of his insolent Mutineers, and that he had cunningly punished them to the uttermost loss of the enemy. At Rome, in the mean time, M. Curius the Praetor propounded in the Senate, the lesson of the water of the River Aricton to the Cittie, which work M. Curius the Centurion had designed out of the enemies spoiles, but several impediments arising, the business for nine years deferred, was now again confulted about, and two men appointed as Supervisors, Curius and Fulvius Flaccus, but Curius dying within five days, the Glory of finishing the work was attributed to Fulvius alone. About the same time Hamilcar came from Carthage into Sicily as succourer to Hannibal. For the Carthaginians, when Hannibal returned after his overthrow, received him with Ignominry, fined him in his fix thousand pieces of Gold and removed him from his Government. Some Authors being desirous of the likenesse of Names, have delivered, that this Amilcar was Father of Hannibal who managed the second Punick War against the Romans; but not rightly, for Hamilcar the Father of Hannibal came into Sicily with command, being but a young man, at the latter end of this War, but his great fame prevailed, that the Acts of another so known Amilcar were ascribed to Amilcar Barca the most Noble and Egregious of that Name. Hamilcar therefore the succourer of Hannibal being the Romans far stronger then himself in their land army, durst not assault any In-Land Cities, nor descend out of the Mountains and difficult places into the Campagnes: but having a strong Navy whereby he was doublest Master of the seas, didse negligent use of those his Forces, and, having sent Hannibal againe to plunder the Coasts of Italy, himself falling about the Sicilian shore, easily recovered many Port Townes which had joynd themselves with the Romans. Whereby it came to paife, that the Romans easily taking and defending the Inland places, the Carthaginians the Maritime, the Paece and hopes were on both sides very equal, and it was hard to Judge to which of these two Nations the Victory of the whole War would encline.
BOOK VII

OUR years were now expired since the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cause to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battle, both over Carthaginians and Syracusians as often as they durst encounter: They had taken many rich Cities by storm, and others upon Articles submitted themselves; but as long as they waged war in an Island, they could not at their pleasure send provision and recruits when need required. And the Carthaginian ships with free and unexpected arrival being themselves secure, did not only molest and vex the Sicilian Cities upon the shore, but likewise wasted the coasts of Italy, both to the loss of the Roman Empire, and likewise to their disgrace; whereas the African shore was clear and free from the enemies invasion. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently consulting upon the matter, did resolve to prepare a Fleet, and fight the Carthaginians not only by land, as hitherto they had done, but to try their fortune at sea also. This was the very first serious thought the Romans had concerning sea affairs, which they accomplished with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had conceived it with Wildom and Resolution: Insomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by sea to encounter a people most skilful in sea affairs, wanted neither Boldneffe to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Contancy effectually to perform it. For the Romans to that day being so utterly ignorant of sea affairs, that there was not a man amongst them who ever had seen one, neither had any one Man of War of their own, or any Carpenter who knew how to build one, yet having with great confidence undertaken the design, they did in a very short time both learn to fail and ventured to fight and overcame those people who for many ages had had experience in sea affairs.

The care of building the ships was committed to Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Scipio Asina, and C. Duilius, who had newly entred the Consulship. They had one Carthaginian ship of five Oars, which Claudius took with his foot army (at what time he was studying to passe over into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came too near the shore and was grounded upon the sands in a shallow place. The Consuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Patterne, and so diligently prosecuted the work, that in three score days after the timber was felled, they had three score ships standing at Anchor. But the Consuls hastened their expedition no lefs by their wit, then by their Industry. For (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskilful at the oar, nor yet to frighten the time allotted them for action in training up and exercising men on purpose) they contrived a device, which though it may at first seem ridiculous, yet in the use and event proved exceeding Comendable. Thit, while the ships were in building, their Men should sit on shore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For being placed in the same order as they were to observe in the ships, and a Boatswaine being let in the midst of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were failing.

By this exercising themselves in fancy only they were so improved, that when the ships were ready, after a few days real paines-taking, the Consuls were willing to trust themselves and
and the safety of all their Legions to their care. When lots were cast for the Provinces, the Land Army fell to C. Duilius, the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius; who, taking along with him seventeen ships, sailed before hand to Methana, to make preparation for the coming of the Fleet, which he ordered suddenly to follow him: but before it came, he fell into the hands of the Enemy, which came to pass by the cunning of Bodes, Hannibal’s Vice Admiral, and his own Credulity, giving credit to some Lipareans, who were suborned by the Enemy, to put him in hopes of taking the City of Lipara by Treachery. There being circumvented by the Carthaginian ships, he neverthelesse resolved to encounter them, and seek his safety by fighting: but that Bodes by another fraud, trained him and his Colonells into his own ship, under pretence of Treating on Conditions of Peace. They were no sooner come but clapt up in chains, the others being hereby terrified did without blowes yield themselves up, Bodes gaining all the Vessels, sent the Prisoners to Carthage. Soon after the Carthaginian Commander committed the like fault to his greater shame, in that the fresh example of the Consuls incapacity did not learn him to be more circumspect. He had underlooked that the Roman Navy falling by the Italian shore, was putting forth to sea, and that they could not now be farre off. Deeming therefore, as near as might be, to ob serve it, that he might accurately know the number of their ships, their swiftnes, and in what fashion and plight their new made Vessells were in, he failed forward with fifty ships, not foreseeing any danger, his ships being confusedly mixed without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any safe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, suddenly falling into the Roman Fleece, which came prepared and falling in good order; he was vanquish’d before he could prepare himself to fight, and having lost the greater part of his Navy, himself likewise being in great Danger, he very hardly escap’d with the rest. The Victorious Navy, understanding Cornelius his might, sent Meffengers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themselves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ships were not farre off. While they did diligently consider the inconvenience of their own Vessells, that they were rudely made, and farre inferior to the Carthaginians in swiftnes, it came into the mind of a certain ingenuous man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep fast the Enemies ships, which Engine they afterward called a Raven or Crow, the fashion of it was this. There was a straight round piece of Timber, four ılls long, some nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof of a pully or windlake, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fitted a bridge, six ılls broad, and four feet long, made of planks fastned together with iron nails. In this Engine there was left a long hole whereby it might be fasted to the piece of Timber, by the space of four ılls, even the whole length of the Timber. The other end of the bridge or ladder, which was not inserted in the Timber, being of two ılls long, was so fastned by hinges, that it might be pull’d up or let fall; to the end of the bridge was affix’d a strong sharp piece of iron, with a ring at it’s head, whereas a rope being tied, through the pulley of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredeckes; then as they lif’t, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its sharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping fast whatsoever it fell upon. In the mean time the Conful C. Duilius, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonells, came to the Navy, and understanding that the Enemies spoileth the Region of Myslaiet, fasted with his whole fleet to that shore. The Carthaginians were glad of this, affuredly proming themselves victory over Inland-men, altogether unskilful in sea affairs, whereby they became an example. That no Enemy whatsoever ought so to be despised, as to cause one to omit ordinary discipline, and grow secure. Hannibal the Admiral, who had conveyed his Forces out of Agrigentum, was in a Vessell of seven oares on a side, which formerly belonged to King Pyrrhus, the other ships followed him: not as to a fight, in any distinct order, but, as every one thought fit, making haft to their despicable Enemy. But when approaching neerer, they saw the Engines hanging at the foredecks of the Roman Ships, wanting at the novelty of the busines, they paus’d a while; at length the most Courageous men laughing at the rude invention of an unskilful Enemy, the foremost ships with all the violence that might be flew upon them. Then the Crows being let down, into what ships soever they light, so pier’d the planks thereof that they held them fast against their wills: The Roman Foulers, if the ships were fastned side to side, did on every part leap in and assault the Enemy; if they were joyned one by one in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with so much the more facility, because on every side of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their passage safer, and their footing more secure: They who went foremost, holding their bucklers behind, defended their faces from the Enemies darts, those who followed held their shields down to the little fence, so guarding their sides, and enter ing the Enemies ships; so that the fight was not performed with the Beakes of ships, but with swords and hands, like a set Battell. The Romans therefore excelling in strength and Courage, had an easy victory over men lightely armed, and trufing more in the nimblenes of their ships; than in their bands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ships, among which the Admirals frigot was taken, but Hannibal leaping out of his ship, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boot escap’d Captivity, and sending a truly friend in post-haste to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capital punishment which other wise had attended him. His friend entreing the Senate, as if all things had been well, well, asked their Advice, whether they thought it fit that the Roman Navy should be fought with? and every one unanimously agreeing, That there was no scruple to be made, and that the business should not be deferred; he told them, 'Tis already done, and we are beaten; whereupon, no body daring to accuse the Fact, whereas every one in his own Person would have been Author, Hannibal escaped the sentence of Death, but was deprived of his Admiralship.

The rest of the Carthaginian ships, (for the greater part was left) after the Flight of the Admiral, were very much troubled and doubtful in Council what to do; they were ashamed to fly having received no harm, the Enemy not so much as pressing upon them; on the other side to set upon the Roman Ships they were afraid, by reason of their Engines. At length falling round about, and finding on every side the forbreaks of the ships opposed against them, with those formidable Engines, having used all the art they could, they desparing of the victory went their way.

'Tis reported that fourteen Carthaginian ships were sunk in that fight, one and thirty taken, with seven thousand men, three thousand having been slain. With this success did C. Duilius Orafius, 47. fight with the Lycian Islands, where the Romans got much prey, but much more ample Glory and Renown. The Conful taking charge again of his Land Army, Marched to Segesta, and delivered it from danger, it having been brought even to the utmost extremity by the Carthaginians: after that he took Macellum by storme, Hamilcar never daring to encounter with him: so having confirmed the minds of the Associate Cities Summer being past, he returned to Rome. After his departure the Carthaginian affairs began again to prosper. For the Romans after seven months continuance were safe to raise their Siege.

Then again many Townes were taken by Hannibal, some by force, some by Treachery: which though it was no good news at Rome, yet the loss was counted small in respect of their Navall Victory. For the Roman courage having already approved it self invincible by Land, they had great cause to rejoice, that by this Fight they had gained reputation of strength by sea also. Whereupon wonderfully encouraging themselves as to the whole Warre, they judged the Author of this their New Glory worthy also of new Honour; Duilius therefore was the First who ever made a Navall Triumph, which was on the Intercalary Calends over the Sicilians and the Carthaginian Navy. They likewise bore with him, when, not content with this Honour, he did without all precedent affume another to himself, that returning from supper, a light Torch was carried before him while the Minstrels Sang; A Beaked Pillar likewise was by decree of the Senate erected in the Market-place, of white Pisan Marble, which is yet to be seen (but many of the Letters worn out with Age) containing the Number of ships taken and drowned, the Summ and Weight of the Money taken. There were taken of Gold three thousand seven hundred pieces, of silver above an hundred thousand, of heavy Brah six score hundred thousand pounds. The Triumph being accomplished, Duilius called an Assembly, wherein L. Cornelius, L. Fo. Cn. N. Scipio and C. Aquilinus M., F. C. N., were chosen Confuls. The Senate ordered their Provinces to be Sicily, and the Navy. The Admiral had permission, if he thought it for the Publick good, to touch upon Sardinia and Corsica. This Charge happening to L. Cornelius, having prepared his ships he failed away.

This was the first Roman expedition into Sardinia and Corsica; the Islands are so near adjoining that they seem but one and the same, yet much unlike, as in the temper of the Air and Soil, so in the Dispositions of the inhabitants. Sardinia as bearing the shape of a man footing, was by the Ancients called Ichnufo and Sandalites; afterwards 'tis said, That Sardus the first Hercules of Lydia much frequenting the Island, gave it the name it is now known by. Old Fables affirm that the Grecians came into those places with Aristees, and after the Trojan was the Trojans. For extent of ground and fruitfulness of soil, it yieldeth not much to the biggest and best Islands of thofe seas. It breedz excellent cattel, very fruitful it is of the best Corn, rich in Metals, especially Silver. But the air is not wholesome, incomuch as foreign Nations commended not so much its Fertility as they dispraised its Pelting air; for in Summer it is sickly especially in the most fruitful places. It produceth likewise an Herb, much like the Bee flower of very violent Poyson, being eaten it disfondeth the mind, and forcibly attracting the Nerves, disforteth the lips as in laughter: the juice of it is mortal, 'twixt after vomiting you drink good store of milk and honyed water: the present force of the disease is so remedied, the other incommodities thereof are cured by the same means as other Convulsions of the Nerves.

Likewise there is a very little creature called Selunga, a kind of Pilimire, which is deadly to those who unawares sit upon it, it is so much the more dangerous, because hardly to be seen of taken notice of by those who are ignorant of its nature. The Sardinians being a Nation mixed of divers sorts of Barbarians, when they are left to their own liberty, chuse rather to live by robbery and plunder, than by husbandry: They are armed with a Target and short Sword, their - Brell.
Bret-plates they few together the out skins of their Rams, which they call Mufmones, bearing not wooll as others, but in flead thereof hair like Goats. Their chiefeft City is Corfica, looking towards Africa and from thence built, with a very fair Haven. Corfica is not to be compared with Sar- dont either for largenesse of Territorie, or for Riches, yet is thought to be the third in bigness of allنته Islands; The inhabitants derive the name of one Corfa, a woman, out of whole Heard a Bull crossed over into this Island from Liguria; the Greeks called it Cyprus. It is Mountainous and Rugged, in many places almost impassable, and the people like to the earth are very rough, without ordinary civility, as untractable as the wild Beasts. When they are taken prisoners they hardly grow gentle, but either out of impatience of labour and servitude kill themselves, or by their contumacy and stubbornnesse are troublesome to their ma-

The Island is plentiful in Honey, but it is of a bitter taft, much like the flower of Box, which tree in great number groweth there; yet it is very wholesome, and many think your Corsicans to be therefore long-lived, because they ordinarily use that Honey. Their Towns are not very great nor very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phocans, and Nicaea of the Etrurians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the seas rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inaccessible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished then tamed, they betowed themselves of many whereunto to keep them under, they likewise corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to low or plant any such thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessaries from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the yoke.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Corfinius bear his course, and first in Corfica stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the rest. From thence as he failed towards Sar-dania, he met the enemies Fleet, which he presently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where seeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well fortified, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and failed home for a recruit of men.

About the same time a fervile Commotion, in the City, which was in the beginning happily suppressed, did both afford the Commonwealth with great fear, and likewise secure it. Many out of the new conquered Nations, were pressed for sea service, whereof there were then foure thousand in Rome, most of them Samnites; these men abhorring the sea, did secretly bemoone their own Condition and so far exasperated one another that they were resolved to burn the City and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Ervini Positius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wisdom prevent all danger. For he reigning himself engaged in the same faction, was made privy to all their Contrivances, he was acquainted with the number of them, nay, with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the place and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private design, but only to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunitie of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perfuadeth them, That when the Senate next met, they should come by bands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that then they should have occasion offer'd of executing their Purpose, or at least understand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and fits. And to gain the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not only a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own dissimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, sent Messengers with good words to pacifie the Rout, and command them home, affuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redress of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy his Right. The Conspirators, thinking their Designs was still kept close, went their way: The night following every Mafter bound his servants, whom according to Positius his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites all so most of them feized upon in their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other busines, or lickness was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not go into Sicily so soon as ordinary, whereby Hamilcar after his last Victorie had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Drapanos, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Erycines thither to Dwell, whole City, left it should be servicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Venus. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceif or by force, and was in a likelihood of conquering all Sicily, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forfake the Island, carried to oppose him. The other Consul had an Easier Task with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia; whether being returned with encrease of Strength, he found Havre there, who after the removal of Hannibal was made Admiral. of the dead bodies, who only man had breath left in him, and being carried orofus, 3 away and diligently fomented ( and many wounds having not one mortal) he recovered, and afterward did great and faithful service to the Commonwealth, and proved of great terror to the enemy. If he had among Grecians performed such a deed of Valor, they would not have known how to have bestowed rewards, or have decreed Monuments enough to his Honor. But being a Roman all the reward such an exploit was a Garland made of Grass; say, they were to negligent in the memory of the very fact, that the name of this valiant man is fearlessly known: Most Authors call him Calpharbinus, but M. Cato calls him Q. Cadibus; Claudius Quadrigarius gives him the name Laberius. But the Conful being freed from those trials he was, made his error an argument of shame, and his danger of watchfulness and circumspection. Therefore with the former courage and care he proceeds to the assault of the City, and being not able to prevail against it without Engines of battery, he borrowed some of Hiero. With them he brake down th'ells, and reduced Camarina into his power, the Citizens for the most part he fold for slavery: Hence he marched to Enna, and had that by treachery delivered to him, the Garrison foriers were part of them slain by the Romans after they were en-retained, the reit fled away and took themselves to places possesed by their own party. Sittano was obtained not by craft or courage, the defendants being driven back and the City formed. Some smaller Towns in the lay of Sicily made no delay, but forthwith sent messengers with promise of submission. T'Conful placing Garrisons in all places convenient, marched into Zamaras. Diderot. In place of Livie's Seventeenth Book.

Whereupon the Garrison of Erbusus being disheartened, forsook the Town. So Erbusus came again into the Romans hands. The Conful Encouraged with this success, and thinking that many of the Liparans favoured him, advanced with his Army to their City: But there he had not the like Fortune. For Hamilcar having intelligence of the Romans Design, privately entered Lipara, and diligently expected the time of Action. The Romans being ignorant of this, boldly and unwarily coming up to the walls, were by a sudden fall of the Carthaginians beaten back. Many were wounded in that Conflic, and no small number slain. In the mean time C. Sulpicius the Conful had many encounters with the Enemy in Sardina, and all prosperously. And his min was so erected, that he made bold to fall toward Af

The Carthaginians by no means enduring any such Attempt, once more made Hannibal Admirall, who since his flight out of Sicily had continued at Carthage, along with him they sent their fleet Sea Commanders, with Order, To take the Enemies Navy from their Coun try-flores. He puts to Sea with a resolution to fight, but a Tempest prevented the Encounter, which being very violent on both Nives, drove them against their walls into more calme places: Both Admirals fortified into Sardian Ports. There lying at Anchor, Sulpicius to draw the Carthaginians out to sea, subhorned some, under presence of Runnageates, to perfwade Hannibal, that the Romans were again failing to Africa. He being deluded by this Craft, suddenly setting Jafe, before he was aware, met with the Conful who in a convenient place waited for him: Mai Carthaginian ships were Junk, before they knew what they were about, the Confuls frugem being much favour'd by a Milt opportunely arising: At Length understanding what was the matter, the other ships went back into the Haven, others drove themselves on jape, where the men landing themselves molt of the Velfids were taken empty. Hannibal, sparing the recover the Port, bought himself to Sulet, where, in a edition, being appeased by the Carthaginians, who had fled out of the same fight, he was by them crucified, and that his Telly and Roffels was the cause of their Overthrow. But this Victory of the Romans was an occasion of some los to them afterwards. For being freed from fear of Carthaginian Navy, while they boldly and se surely waited the Grounds, they were suddenly used by an unexpected incursion of Sardinians and Carthaginians, one Hamo being Commander. C. Dnius was this year Cenour, and built the Temple of flamas in the Her-Marko. After this two Triumphs were made, the one of C. Aquillius Florus Pro conful over the Carthaginians, the fourth of the Nones of October, the other of C. Sulpicius the Conful over the Carthaginians and Sardinians, the third of the Nones. When C. Asilius M.F. N. Regulus; and C. Cornelius, L. F. Cn. N. Blago again were Confuls, the Senate order sacrifices to be made for avoiding the O men of some Prodylges. In the Alban Mount, and the jake places, and in the City it fell many jones fell as Haile; Twas thought fit to Solemnize the Latin Feastall, and in order to that, a Dictatour was created, St. Ogulius, L. F. A. Cultor. The Moller of Horfe was M. Latorius. M. F. M. N. Pelisianus. C. Asilius the Admiral having failed to Tyrdy dei in Sicily, when he eipied the Carthaginian Navy byng by, out of order, suddenly rail

ed to set upon it; and commanding the other ships follow, hastily sets forward with ten, with which were Ready, and with all speed both of fail and more endeavours to overtake the Carth aginians, still before him. Hamilcar, a very confidable Commander, was in that Fleet who seeing but few ships near him, others scarce yet out the Haven, the greater part still at Anchor, fleeing back, circumvented Asilius and ships with his whole Navy, none of them he sink presently, not able to maintain fight with great a Number. The Admirals Frigat being better manned, and the Mariners encouraged with the presence of the Conful, brake out from amongst them by main strength and saved it. For the other Roman Vessells were nowe come up, by whose help the Fortune of the Jafe was changed. Eight of the Carthaginian ships were Junk, ten with all their men take the rest fleered to the Liparena Ilands. Thefe things were done at Sea. The Land Forces not so quick at their Work, having in vain assaflad the City Lipara. But with all hoby they spoild the open Fields; the fame Calamy also attended the Iland Maltese, not farre lance. For these Exiploes C. A silius the Conful made a Naval Triumph over the Carthagians. The fame year A. Asilius the Pro-Conful Triumphed over the Carthaginians of Sicily the fourteenth of the Calfands of February. The Romans were then in a very joyful state of condition, being Victours not only at Land, but at sea also. And did now begin to Con, not only of the Conquest of Sicily and the Neighbouring Ilands, which they thought sufficient, but of invading Africa also, and bring the Terror of the War to the Coz of Carthage it selfe.

BOOK VIII.

Afterwards L. Manlius A. F. P. N. commonly called Longus, did enter upon the Confuls, and L. Cæcilius, Q. F. Q. N. after whole death, M. Atilius M. F. L. N. Regulus, who had been sometimes Conful, succeed in his Office. Then only in this year Africa, which hitherto been free from any miseries by an Enemy, began to be sensible of ail, when the Romans had made an invasion thereunto, after they had in a great Sea fight gained the Victory over the Carthaginians for which exploits, as they were achieved, we shall in this Book set forth, and both the one and other fortune of that fame Regulus, and his end not suitable to the gallantry of the man. The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Atilius being Conful, did so thrive to get a beat in a Sea-conflict, that when they had loft many ships, they first gave over fighting: yet because they had sunk some certain of the Roman Vessels, they would not take themes to have been of lefteft reputation. On the other part, the Romans did judge that event an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vail multitude on both sides did bend their mindest greatest emulation to the study of Sea-Affaires. And therefore the Confuls being chargd to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to Missana, with an Armado of one hundred and thirty ships, and thence palling by the Coast of Sicil on the right hand, they Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having also some Forts near the Hill Eumen, they failed forward. And about the same time Hamilcar General of the Carthaginians, d Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and sixty ships, ving passed by Lilibaum in Carthage, and then Heraclea Minoa, in that bay they con of calling Anchor, observin the motions of the Romans, and if they durst bend towards Sea, they were in a posture to lop their course; which when the Confuls were informed of by good advice make all things ready for either chance, that they might not be to seek Confull, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or to draw some whither for safety, therefore committing the ships to some of the flouett Souldiers, they make four Squadrons, as so many parts of the whole fleet, the choicest men they set in the first Squadron, the next Squadrons they place in their order, in the Reare-guard they put their chieftest men of strength, the Triarri, these forces they dispose of in such array, that each ship did carry 3 crowers, and six score Souldiers. So the Multier Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thousand men.

The Carthaginians did forwhat exceed that number, leading more Souldiers than an hundred and fifty thousand. d Indeed the Confuls did scarce esteem of any other force of Souldiers in comparision of them. There was so much the more consulting, when it did appear, they must needs fight the deep Ocean, where the swiftness of the ships, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell-array against that danger; finally the consider of placing the whole Fleet aright. They set two Gallies wherein the Confuls themselves were carried, very even in the Van, to both those Gallies they joyn on this side the first squadron, on that side the second in a long continued row; the ships being placed in such manner, that the fore cattles of them all were turned outwards, and the Gallies did move almost joyne together, the ships next to those did keep from each other more apart, and so consequently the space left between the opposite ships did grow wider according to their being set in order. So when the form of the Van in manner of a wedgeshaped, with small distance between the first ships, and with great spaces between the last, then did they cause the third Squadron to advance, which bearing that open space between the two first ships, did meetly by their side, exhibit a triangular form of the whole array, behind this, at the third Squadrons back, the long boats were drawn by a Barge with Cables to pull with, reaching to the ships of the Taritius squadrons. The Taritius the fouldiers set in the Rear-word, did so inviron the form, the ships being stretched out into a battle circle, that from each Wing they did appear; So to whole body with a deep hollow front, the bindmost parts being firmly solid, did resemble the favour of a ship, not les able to receive a violent fault, then hit to give one.

But the Carthaginian Captains having intelligence by their Scouts of the approach of the Roman fleet, when they considered, the Village to their City was not difficult, the common fort were nothing manly, the bordering Neighbours inconstant, and very prone to fall from their fidelity, they conclude to go out to the then; being resolved first to try all that might be, rather then they would suffer, that the Roman Vessels should have a safe Voyage into Africa. Therefore they betake them to the ships, encouraging their men in foot, That they would undertake the fight with minds fully bent and clear-sight, well remembering they were to fight, not only touching things present, but in reference to all things, which each hand held precious at home; and with their own good hope and that of their fellow Seamen, they launch forth out of the Harbour, nor was the Roman else they give the shock against each other with did to provide, that Hamno should charge on the left, where the Romans else they give the shock against each other with did to provide, that Hamno should charge on the left, where the Romans was doubtfull, that might break the array of the Romans did charge his fouldiers, when the Conflict began, they would preferly take their flight, which being done, and the Romans eagerly pursing them, the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their flying, in regard their ships were swift Vessels with sails, and five oars in a part, Hamno did stretch it out all he could towards the main Ocean, being ready to surround the Enemy, the skirmish should begin at any other part. And the Consuls not staying long did venture to interpose with their two Squadrons into the midst of the Carthaginian ships; Hamno that might break the array of the Romans. But the Conflict began, they should preferly take their flight, which being done, and the Romans eagerly pursing them, the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their flying, in regard their ships were swift; but the art of the Romans, as Hamilo withled and had forseen, was rent at once, when the Ereal, and the third Squadron did keep their places, which, when he saw it performed, he fuddily gives a sign out of his own ship, that their fore-eaftles being turn'd, they should encounter that did pursue them; the fight was doubful, the Carthaginians excelling in swiftness, as skill for Navigation. The Romans being farre transcendant in the stoutness of their Japs; Therefore so long as the fight rather of the ships, then of the men, did last, the Carthaginians had the better clearly: But when they began to fight hand to hand, the ship being made fast with grappling irons, then the Victory did certainly incline towards the Roman party: When the fouldiers full of confidence through his hand-strokes, and fighting thee the Consulls, did strive to approve his valour to them with a more notable endeavour: the skirmish was so managed in that part, Hamno with the Right Wing, which hitherto he feem'd, had made a fierce assault, being carried by the tide amongst the ships of the Taritius, and create them much talkt, when they were brought to great ciphers; At the fume almost, the Left Wing also of the Carthaginians, the fight posture being changed, and in front made even, does assaile with dangerous beaks the third Squadron of the Romans, wh drew their long boats by a Barge. The Romans having flipt their Cables, did prepare themselves for resistance; Here also they thow much Gallantry: So in three places, there did happen even yet so many Sea-fights, far distant from each other.

When they had fought so hard, the Victory long enough inclin'd to either side, at left it chanced, as needs it must, where there is fierce bickering in landyies at once, with equal force and vehemency, that the selfe fame part which is frist routed, did cause the whole Victory. For when Hamilo was utterly unable any longer to withstand the violence of his Enemies, his single flight did immediately disappear even the whole fleet of the Carthaginian. For L. Mar-lus one of the Consulls being very much busied about bringing tother the ships that were taken, and chainning to them his own, M. Regulus elpying the flight to begin aerie in another place, he made hale to relieve his own side, taking to him the ships the second Squadron, all that escaped out of the former fight safe and unshattered; The Tav did soon perceive that reliefe, and recollccting their Spirits, which had even failed them intemity of Danger, they began to oppose their Enemies with great undauntednes. Hamno, who saw that both those before him made fluent resistance, and that himselfe was so over-charge on the Reare with fresh supplies, hoisting up faile he did his best to avoid his approaching overwiew. And when L. Mar-

Hannibals" trials befall'd the third Squadron of the Romans to be enforced towards land by the Carthaginians Left Wing, he steer'd that way, and *M. Legatus overtook him unawares, who had even now set the long boats and the *Triarii out of har'mes reach. So the flate of things is now quite changed, and they are surrounded very close, who but three weeks before had hemmed the Romans in. Whom indeed being strangely encapaffed, and in a manner straightly besieged, they might e're this have utterly destroyed, unless not daring to go near them for fear of the iron raven-beaks they were wont to grappling with, they gave the Consuls time enough, that themselves being safe they might even secure their own side, and the Carthaginians, that were environed by a sudden surprize; had leisure to do, as well as they, fifty ships, and all that were therein, to the other few sealing away by so very scarce tide did make their escape.

This Sea-conflict as well in regard of various ill accidents, and the eagerness of the encoun-ter, as also for the number of ships lost on both sides was so fair remark. Of the Carthaginian ships thirty and three were taken, above thirty were sink. The Conquering Romans lost four and twenty by reason of foul weather, but of one of them did fall into the hands of the Enemy.

When this victory was over, returning to Afina they allotted certaine daies to mend their ships, and refet their men, and to take afte of new provision. Amongst which, Hamilcar when he would not yield by any mans, the Romans should go to Africa, but wanted strength to stop their march, he betook himself to bratagem, and fought, by sending Hann to them to sue for peace, to prolonge the time till the arrival of the forces whch he look'd the Carthaginians would send him. *Hann when he made his address to the Consuls, and heard the exclamations of the people, at the same decree ought to pass against him, which five years before the Carthaginians had sign'd against Cornélius Asina, then Conful, he shifted off the threatened mischief with a subsidium, *verity if ye shall doe so (ladies he) ye shall not be better at all then the very Africans; as presently the Consuls well reftent what he said, commanding thofe to be silent that had not him to chains, and there was a voice heard well beleeving the gravity of the Roman Rock, Hann, the faithful dealing of our City doth not thee from that fear. It was in vain to move peace because the Carthaginian did not defal fin-erely, and the Consuls did rather aim at *Verey then at Peace. Therefore they had no mind to defer any longer their intended voyage to *Africa. Neither did the Carthaginian Commanders cofte the divide, though they engaged each other, not to endure the enemy should march without disturbance, but to infet him in troubles, and to bar his passage. But Hann making halt to fortify Carthage beforehand, Hamilcar not daring to attempt ought barries at Heraclea. The Romans ships made a fair runge free both from enemies and from tempests. And there wanted not some that did strange bominatise any travelling far by sea, and the enemies coat, and the very name of Africa, Mannala, an Officer amongst the foulidiers, did first begin to speak ill of government, but *Rex was so incendent against him, that he threatened him that scourges and the axe shoudl be his; unless he would submit. So at length the Consul was obeyed, and the nearer and the greater did expel the dread of travelling by sea. The Promontory is called Hermouss which from *bosome of Carthage does stretch very far into the Sicilian sea. That coast was first found out by the Roman ships, then after a little stay while the whole fleet came up together, the enemis having passed by the coast of Africa, they arrived at the City Clupea. Here the *Idlers are exposed to hazard, and when the ships were put into harbor, there was a Trench drawn round for the more securitie. The City because it refused to surrender, was besieged, and presently through the timorousnesse of the Citizens it being either yielded or defeated (as is reported either way) it was reduced to the obedience of the Romans.

But the Carthaginians though they did endure things truly hard, and very strange, yet they rejoyned at their weal, that th fared somewhat better then they expected: for when they heard what trouble the Se-fight had, they were fore afraid, least presently the conqueting forces would have been drawn even a pl Carthage itself. Therefore re-affuming some courage after their former fright, they were bent to make what strength they could to defend their City and the Suburbs thereof. As while the Consuls having sent messengers to *Rome which would acquaint the Senators with exploits had been achieved already, and should beleech their advice touching new attempt, they make Clupea a Garrison, that they might make use of that feast of war. And haveting a guard to defend the City and field adjoyning, they marching a great way forward will their other forces, they utterly waste a very fruitful Country, which from the days of *Aphobes had not seen the sword of an enemy; they destroy many goodly Villages, they force away whole droves of cattle, moreover they lead away by force above twenty thousand me to man daring to gainpay; they also take many Towns by storm or by surrender, wherein apprehend several Revolters, and set free many Roman Captives, that were taken in the late *res, amongst whom I believe even *Cn. Cornelius to have been, that was chosen Consul against two years were expired. While things are thus acted, they that were sent to *Rome by the enemis, return with Orders from the Senate. One of them was commanded to quarter in Africa, with such considerable forces as they held needful to be kept there. The other was raised to bring back the reft of the fleet, and the residue of the army to Rome. So Winter now drawing near, M. Regulus continued there with almoft fifteen thousand foot, five hundred horfemen, and with forty ships, what remained of the Fleet being richly laden with Captives, and other booty L. Munius having safely paffed by the Coasts of Sicily, he carried back to Rome. And he led along with him to Rome twenty feven thoucand Captives, and the Naval Triumph over the Carthaginians was ordain'd for him. Afterwards Ser. Fulvius, M. F. M. N. Paulus the more noble, and M. Aemilius, M. F. L. N. Pauelus were made Confuls.

The Government of Sicily and the Command of the Fleet are committed to the charge of those two: They were not minded to call back Regulus from amid his Victories, while he was gone. That decree of the Senate no person did worse reftent, than be himself, for whose honour it was made. Therefore in his Letters to the Senate he made that his grievance, and fett it up as the main ground of his fuit, that another might succeed him in Office, upon the death of his Bai-liffe (he undertook to manage a piece of ground of seven Acres, which his Matter had in Pupinio) having gained an opportunity, he then delivered up his Commission, and left his charge, wherefore he muft needs depart, left in highneffe, when his ground lay unfettled, his wife and children should want bread. And the Senate did ordain, that M. Regulus his ground fhould be drefted at the Publick charge, that what image he had fultanied fhould be made good, and fair provision fhould be made for his wife at children. Such good orders were then in use:
But when I read of or relate these things and fuch, I cannot fufe but recollect with my felf, which is the more lafting recompence for vice, a reward by Coin, or by comnemoration, by pounds, or by praiie. M. Regulus his renoun does endure many ages after his death; the wealth of others hath paffe with their Matter, and oftentimes before them: In the meanwhile the Carthaginians having chofen two Generals at home, M. Adreniac, Hannos, and Bafcar, they fent also for Hamioes their thirde commander in chief to come out of Sicily.
Who with five thoufand Foot, and five hundred lye came in all hate from Heraclea to Carthage. Thefe having called a Council do decreaf the Army should not be kept within Walls, as the manner heretofore had been, neither would the Roman foildiers be permitted to do what they liket without any punishment. So we, they were encouraged to wage War, the Army was drawn out.

In the mean time M. Regulus did march to all place adjoining, through which the River Bagrada does flide, fubduing all before him, not far in which the Romans that held certain Caffles, were fritten with a fluden perfecution, and loft by, and were forfe amaz'd. A water-Serpent of huge bignefs did fet upon the foildiers, and being much afrighted and reftifed all in vain, the Serpent did swallow down many of them, their fide yawning jaws, others he blind'd to pieces with his furious windings, and with the flie of his tail, some again he poifon'd to death with the blaffing of his pelliferous breath, and made fo much ado for M. Regulus, that with all his forces he muft fight with the Serpent for the possifion of the River, which, when it was done with the lofe of many foildiers, and the Dragon did neither be overcome, nor wounded, with his extrem hard crust of Scales eafily repelling, we e'ert they did throw at him, they muft make use of Engines, and without great Guns Mortar-pieces, like a well fenced Tower, the Enemy is not to be overthrown. After feverall flings that were made in vain, a great lone being call'd did break his back-bone all to fhivers and did difolve the vigorous violence of the formidable Monifter. And the business was ended with fo much difficulty, and with fo great terror to Horfe and Foot, that the foildiers averre they had rather oppofe Carthage it felfe, then fuch another Monifter. And the Cat could flay there no longer, but muft flan the infected waters, and all the Country round about which was blaffed with the contagious fit of his lying there. This was some fame to the prid men, which are wont to think very fondly, that they can Conquer all things. Truely when M. Regulus was General, that had been Conquerour by Sea and Land, one fingle Serpent when he's alive (did hold the whole Roman Army in plean, and being killed, he made the Army draw off. And therefore the Proconful did hold it no immoderately to fend the spoils even of this very Efty to Rome, and to acknow-edge with a publick Monument the greatnefs of his own fear, his rejoicing at the victory.
For he took order the skin of the beafh fhould be taken off and rived to Rome, which is reported to have been an hundred and twenty foot long, and being fugg'd up in a certain Temple to have lafted even till the Wars at Numantia. When the Camps removed from Bagrada, the Conful commanded the Army towards the City Adis, all Wars and Caffles being won and demolifh'd that lay in their road.

But to Adis, which was hard to take, there was a certain way offering fige by the help of warlike engines. To the crofing of which, when the Carthaginians faw it did speedily make half their late down on a certain hill, but full of wood and full of other impediments that was very near the Roman Camp. M. Regulus having well confidered the nature of the place, and what manner of enemies he had to deal with, when he faw their foot ye not comparable to his, but that they put much confidence in their Elephants and horfemen, it fuch forces being very formidable in open fields by the inequality of the places would not come at, and would be made very ufelefs, he widely taking some advantage by the folly of his enemies, before they could perceive and correct their error, determines to fall upon them in their own Tents. Wherefore encouraging his soldiers, and diligently observing what reason did suggest, he goes out of his Camp before the awaking of the day, and does cause his army to advance towards the hill directly opposite, where the Carthaginians had pitched their Tents. First of all, the audacious confidence of the Romans did even amaze the Carthaginians, which being far lesse in number did set upon such a vast army even in their own trenches, from a low place, and of great dis-advantage. Then they were in the greater confusion even in this respect, because the horse-men and Elephants, from which they did hope for most assistance, were not only of no advantage, but did extremely hinder and disturb them, and the very time did augment their trembling, that the Romans did set upon them unawares, and most of them, as yet, being fast asleep, therefore many of them are put to the sword even in their tents, the others frigaling in their amazed flight, and not knowing where to hide themselves, were taken by parties let on purpose to way-lay them.

Nevertheless the Carthaginians Mercenary soldiers, the Spaniards and the French, being instantly in a good posture, and fighting Couragiously on the other side of their bulwark it was doubtful a great while which would get the upper hand. The forlorn hope even now being put to the run, the whole Roman army had been overthrown, if the horse from another quarter that were commanded to wheel about had not in the very nick of time charged the eminence on the rear that were pursuing those which fled. Then they also which a little before had deferred their flight might now be rallied up and encouraged to fight anew. So the enemy being set upon both sides, when he had for a long time with much gallantry made resistance, he was constrained to cry quarter.

When the Carthaginians saw what was done, immediately they brought themselves out of their Sconces, and fall to running with all the speed they could make, and indeed the Elephants and the horsemen when once they came into plains they could retreat well enough and safely too. The Conquerors having pursued the infantry somewhat far, they turn back at length to throw down their fortifications. In this Battall there were seventen thousand of the Carthaginians that were slain, five thousand are reported to be taken prisoners, and eighteen Elephants. The successe of this battall did purchase the Romans much friendship not only from all the Countrys round about, but even from people that were most remote. And in few days about fourcorse wafted towns vowed fidelity to the Romans. Whereas on the news that Tunis such a fenced City was taken by REGULUS did even astonish the Carthaginians that were greatly traitred before, and which was built twelve miles from Carthage, leaft it Livie, 30. 9 suffer what ever they did there to bekept secret from the enemy, then being a fair prospect both to the very City it selfe, and to the fa hard by.

And the terrible dread of their war with the Romans did not onely dance round the Carthaginians, but the Numidians also, out of aold grudge being stirred up by a fresh opportunity, took up arms, and by spoiling and hirring the Carthaginian towns, brought more terror and mifery upon them, then the Romans did. And the Boores from all parts flying for refuge to the City, did cause not only a hug dread, but also a great dearch, when such a multitude of people did devour a world of provision, and the avarde of the owners did conceale the plenty as yet in store, who gaping greedily for gain by that Common Calamity were full of hope the price of victuals would raise daily according to the decreese of their most necessary food. Whereupon it followed, the Embassie of Marcus Regulus was hearkned wth greater breed, who aiming at the honor of finishing the war, and fearing leaft some one that might succeed him with a new commission from ROME should prevent him, he moves the Carthaginians to Conditions for peace. To that purpos some of the prime Senators are sent unto him, but when they saw strange harsh conditions offered, and their business at a stand, they took their leave of M. REGULUS, who was verily perceived he had Victory by the hand, SICILY fortooth, and all SARDINIA were commanded to yeeld, to send freely home what Romans they had taken, to ransom their own men, to bear the whole charge of the war, and to pay besides a pension by the year. They had other impositions, full as burthenome as these. That they should be confederates with the Romans for offence and defence, that they should use but one great ship, but the Romans they should affift with fifty galleys well appointed as off as they should be required. The Embassadours being transported with wonder at such Articles, and that REGULUS might DISJUDICED, he grant his vanquish suppliants more milde conditions, he made this answer, Men must either b. 15

 CONQUER or to chance to those that subdue them. By the return of which words the Carthaginians were much incenched, though they had often made futile for peace, yet they are fully bent, but the multitude of their Commanders, that knew not the duty of their places. This rumor being soon dispers'd, when XANTIPPOS was called before the Magistrates, he does produce such such evident reasons of that his judgement, that scarce ought could be more manifest; he shews them that in all their expeditions, in making their Fort, in joining Battell, it was their manner till to pick out places utterly unfit, if they would listen to his advice, he does affure them not one of safety, but also of Victory. When severall of the Chief Citizens do approve of his judgement, and the very Commanders also themselves, and with becoming modesty preferring the welfare of their Country before his single opinion, they agree and ordain that the guidance of his Army should be committed to a foreigner, Xanthippos having undertaken his charge, dayly drawing his foultiers out of the City, he does accomtume the field Forces to observe and change their ranks, and instantly to do what they are commanded, and the confidence of better success does fill the foultiers with admiration of him, the whole City being certified even in despair, is raised up to expect joyfull things to come. When the Commanders behold this Universal cheerfulness, they also taking heart thereby, resolve to give the Enemy another charge, and encouraging their foultiers, as opportunity did require, they march out against the Romans, even with almost twelve thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, and well nigh as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they saw the Carthaginians make their inroads through the plain fields, having changed their fit design, avoiding all steep and craggy places; But being pulled up with pride through their constant vicinity, they let at once the foultiers that were wont to vanquish, and Gracchus their Leader. And Regulus was not corrupted with that fawning poylon of fortune waiting on him. When he well considered that he had routed the Sea Forces of the Carthaginians and the fort Souldiers too, that he had taken almost two hundred Townes, two hundred thousand Men, and that Carthage being fore strengthened, might be enforced to surrender, he denied them peace when they sued for it on reasonable terms, and wrote to Rome, That the very Gates of Carthage which he had besieged did tremble at him. So also moderation hath often defeated great Spites in prosperity, then constancy in adversity: But the Carthaginians having pitch their tents in a plain field, M. Regulus whole chiefest strength was in his infantry, and thither he could not be followed but over Mountains and steep difficult places, thinking it all one to his Valour where he fought, he was not afraid to trust himself in the Camp, even to the greater want of his confidence, passing over the river that was in the midst, and distant from the Enemy even two hundred thousand paces. Xanthippos perceiving the indiscretion of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promis'd the Carthaginians for he had got the Romans even tires with long Marching, where his heart could with them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; yet the time also did seem most commodious for the fight, because the day now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places about them, if they should be overcome, they might make their escape the better in the night, or if they should conquer, the night would not hinder the pursuit of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians consulted what was to be done, Xanthippos calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they might not lose such a singular opportunity he did earnestly persuade his men to undertake the Battle, so much the easier, because the foultiers themselues crymg out to Xanthippos, they did of their own accord with unwialful cheerfulness desire to encounter the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he draws out the Army, and does exercize them after this manner. A four square body of 5000 Carthaginians, which were the prime Chosen men of all their foot, was set for a releve; before this body, one convenient space being left between, the Elephants are set in order, being drawn up as broad as that square body, on either wing the Horse are placed behind these on the Right Wing, stands the main body of hired foultiers. The Army being set in such array, he commanded the skirmishers, that having thrown their darts, they should stand in open order for the advantage of their own side, and when their main body should join with the Enemy, they should violently break out again from the Wings, and should on a sudden furiously flanke the Romans, when they were charging the opposite relieve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he saw the Elephants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he soon takes advice, he brings his foultiers lightly armed to the Van, he sets the well Compact foot-Companies in the relieve, the Horse are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is firme in respect of depth, but much narrower then before; so that the chiefe danger being feared from the Enemies Elephants and Horsemen, they did indeed take a right course against the Elephants, but being in an open and Champaign Country, there was room sufficient for the Horse to turnround, the whole Army being so close compacted. The Fight was began by the Elephants, which Xanthippos commanded to be led against the opposite Regiments, and the Romans making a great shout, set forward to meet them. The Horse were likewise engaged in both Wings, but there the Romans being much inferior in Number, and not able to till the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot who were of the Left Wing, (whether it was to avoid the Elephants, or that thereby they thought the more easily to obtain the Victory charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, pursued them to their very Camp. The rest of the foot had an harder task against the Elephants, by whose tall bodies their ranks were disordered, themselves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling house, struck down to the ground, yet the very thickness of the Battell hindered them from breaking through; till at last they were diffirded on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were galled by the Horie, the foremost who made a shift to break through the Elephants, were flain by the Enemy.
In place of Livie's Eighteenth Book.

Enemy standing yet Entire, and the light-armed men flying in upon them. There was no less execution done in the flight of the Elephants and Numidian Horse pursuing them in an open plain place. Regularly: with almost five hundred fouldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army they there escaped but about two thousand (who had charged and put to flight the Mercenaries) who beyond all Hopes, by their halt, got safe into Clupea; of the Romans and their Associates were slain about thirty thousand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting besides eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought against the Left Wing of the Enemy. When the Army returned to Carthage after so great a Victory, carrying the Roman General Perforner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others standing in the streets, or in their houses, beheld the spectacle with wonderfull Pleasure, which they durst last, scarcely hope for; their minds being not capable to believe so great an Happiness attending them: For being of late to near despair, giving not only their Country, but very City for lost, they durst scarcely believe to great a Change, though they saw it with their eyes: But they took most special notice of the Generals, every ones eye and thought beingsettled on them, looking sometimes on Xanthippe, sometimes on Regularus, Exolling the greatnes of their own Commander, by the Elevation they had of the other. He must of necessity be a gallant Man who hath overcome so few a General, to fortunate a Warrior, a proud Conqueror, an implacable Enemy, the Terror and Plague of Carthage, now of a sudden bereaved of a numerous Army, having left his ancient Fame and Liberty together. Their Admiration was encreased by the habit and Garbe of the Man, who under a small body, and none of the best lookes, carried a large and virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippe had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he used as much art as in finishing the Warre, for whereas he might justly expect an everlasting reward of his good service at Carthage, yet he resolved to leave those doubtful hopes and full of Treschery, and return home, before other mens affections, or his own fortune were altered. For this is for the most part the disposition of men, that openly they profess the love of their Country, but really study their own private good: as long as their City being in safety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty love to their Country: But where there is danger left they should betowe the fame benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, then have him in the least way hinder their private commoditie: As long as they think themselves able to equal others, their envy is hidden and more tems, but when they see themselves farre exceeded, and that Honour duly given to others which they desired for themselves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they seek it by Calumnyes and Criminations. So that the best men have ordinarily most Enemies and are most subject to Treschery: But a Native of the Country hath some remedy against this Evil in his Friends and Kindred: A stranger being void of all helpe and assistance encreareth the Malice of degenerate minds by his being easie to be hurt in that he is more expos'd to Treschery, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippe apprehended and considered these things, the sequel doth evidently demonstrate, 'Tis reported he was drown'd by some Jesu after ... from the Carthaginians, who after so great a benefite received, hated the Author of it, who being once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Country was preferred by a For- eigner.

Others deny Xanthippe thus to have perished, yet confess the Treschery of the Carthaginians, who as his Departure allotted him an old Ship, full of Leakes, fairly pitched over as if it had been found, but that he discovering the Cheats, went aboard on another ship, and escape the danger. About the same time they committed another fact of no les Treschery, but much more cruel, by reason of the number that perished thereby. The Mercenaries in somewhat a tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their paines taken, and happy Vourour, were put into ships being made believe that in some other place they should have their Defence. But the Captains of the Ships who had such private Orders, landed them and left them in a Barren island, where being destitute of all helpe from man, without food, without ships; having famine on one side, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and perish'd, a foul and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and that the Island was thereupon called Offodes, or the Banie Island, it lieth in the main Sea beyond Lipara Wellward. These deeds whenever and howsoever performed, do nothing disagree with the Carthaginians usall Cruelty. And if thus they served their Friends and Associates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily seaverse against their Enemies. Other Prisoners indeed were somewhat tolerably well used, for they likewise had many Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But against M. Rugulus they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of ways; they allowed him food which was neither pleasant to the Palate, nor strengthening to the Body, but which with much ado by a slighth nourishment served to produce his Miserable life. But more grievous were the Contumelies and Reproaches daily heaped upon him, amongst the rest, they would frequently on a sudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noise and ugly shape of it, not suffering him to rest neither in Mind or body, and being thus miserably handled, and brought low, they cast him into the common Gaole.
When these things were heard at Rome, the City was filled not only with great grief but with fear also, for they mistrusted lest the Carthaginians, provoked with the snare of their own calamities, and encouraged by this victory, should recommence them in the like kind, and dare to come even to the walls of Rome to inflict on them the same mischiefs themselves had suffered. The Senate therefore commanded the Consuls, To strengthen Italy as diligently as might be with sufficient Garrisons, themselves with a vast Navy to sail into Sicily, and hence if they thought fit into Africa, to divert the Carthaginians from any expedition into Italy. But the Carthaginians in the first place made it their care to reduce those Cities which the Romans had possesse'd, to punish those Africans who had revolted from them, and by strength of arms to vanquish those who perished in rebellion. Clupea was indeed by the Romans loosely defended, but, in Numidia, and over the other Africans (though their war was great,) their victory was ease.

In the mean time, understanding that a great Fleet was preparing in Italy, they left the siege of Utica which they had commenced, trimmed up the old ships, built new ones, and laboriously endeavoured to prevent the Romans from landing on the African shore. The Consuls used such incredible diligence, that by the beginning of Summer they had three hundred and fifty ships ready fitted and laden, with which falling to Sicily, when they found all things safe there, and no danger, but that they were full of expectations and fears, they left Garrisons where most need was, and with the rest of their army steered towards Africa. But being by a tempest forced upon Cissa (an Island between Africa and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybaum) they waited the grounds there, took a City of the same name, and placed Garrisons in it. Then they let forward to the Promontory of Hermus, which being in the mean-way between Carthage and Clupea, thirtieth in one side of the Carthaginian Gulf. At this place the Carthaginian Navy met them, and a very sharp fight was entered into on both sides, when help came to the Romans from Clupea, which totally inclined the victory, being before doubtful. An hundred and four of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, thirty taken, and fifteen thousand foiards lost; on the Roman side eleven hundred men were lost, and nine ships. The fleet then sailed to Utica, where they landed their men, and pitched their Camp near the City; The Carthaginians likewise brought their forces thither under the conduct of Hannu, where in a land fight they were overcome with the loss of above nine thousand men. There were some Noble men taken prisoners, whom the Consuls referred whereby to redeem M. Regulus and others who were in the like condition. They then confounded on present affairs, and conceived great hopes they might keep Africa in possession: Nevertheless the country round about being plunder'd and spoiled, they, fearing a famine, thought fit to return into Sicily, together with those Romans who had defended Clupea. They carried away very rich spoil, which had been laid up in Clupea in the time of Regulus his prosperity, and much overcrost by late victories. They had a safe Voyage into Sicily, and sufficiently fortunate had been the Consuls if they would have let alone that happy navigation. But because in their return to Italy they thought by the bye to take some Port towns of Sicily, not regarding the ship-masters counsel (who advised them, Not to sail in those dangerous and rough seas against the coast of Africa, now Orion and the Dog Star were rising,) they suffered such shipwreck as hath hardly been heard of, of three hundred thousand and four ships, scarce fourscore, having cast out all their lading, were faved; much about the same number of horse-boats and other sorts of vessels were lost, in much as the whole shore, even from the coast of Camarina (where the storm began) to Pachybas, was filled with the Corps of dead men, and horses, and pieces of broken ships. In this their hard distress the humanity of King Hiero was no small comfort to them, who bountifully entertained them, furnishing them with clothes, and victuals, and tackling for their ships, and conducted them safe to M. Sali. But the Carthaginians made no delay to take advantage of this their misfortune, they presently regained the Iland and City of Cissa; and forthwith crossing over into Sicily beliged Agrigentum under the command of Carthalo, and no relief coming, they took it and demolished it: A great multitude of perons were here slain and taken prisoners, the others, who escaped through the midlands into the territories of Syrachus, planted themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympus. Neither were they out of hopes of recovering the whole Iland, but that the Romans associats confirmed and strengthened themselves against present fears, hearing what diligence was used in preparing a new Navy; for the Consuls were so intent upon the work, that with wonderful speed, in the space of three months, an hundred and twenty ships were built. With thele Cn. Cornelius L. F. C. N. Sempis Afina, and A. Atilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus being Consuls again, having made a new leavy of flour foildiers, were commanded with the first opportunity to let to sea. This Cn. Cornelius was a great example of the Inconstancy of Fortune, and of Patience in Adversity, for having seven years agoe, when he was Consul been circumvented by the craft of the Carthaginians, and fudder'd captivity, imprisonment and chains, and whatsoever misery is incident to mankind, he now resumed not only the other Ornaments of his degree, but likewise the Consular Dignity with so much the more joy, by how much the fadder misfortune he had been before bereaved of them.

The Consuls having arrived at Megara, and joyned to themselves what ships they found there, being chiefly the Relicks of the last ship-wrack, sailed with two hundred and fifty ships to
to the mouth of the River Himera, and took by treachery the Town of Cephalodius, some eighteen miles distant upon the same shore: From Drepanus (for thither they had steered their course) they departed without effecting their purpose, being not able to take it on the sudden, and Carthage having sent thither supplies in cases of a siege. Being not thereby discouraged from farther attempts, they happily accomplished another design of greater moment. They directed their course to Panormus, the principal City of the Carthaginian jurisdiction, and poisselling the Haven, faze down under the very Walls, and the Panormitans refusing to yield, they encompassed the City with a Ditch and Bulwark. The nature of the ground favoured their intentions, yielding plenty of materials and wood for their works, which being finished, they began the assault, and battered down with their Engines a Tower by the sea side, and the soldiers entering by the breach, with great slaughter of the enemy, took the outward City, which was called New Panormus; the old City did not long hold out, for a great number flying thither out of the new City, bringing along with them more terror than provisions, they were dejected with consideration of their present danger, and fearing sudden scarcity, sent messengers to the Consuls with proposals to yield up all but their bodies; the Consuls knowing the wants of the besieged, accepted not the conditions unless they would redeem themselves at a certain price. Every head was valued at two Mine; fourteen thousand persons were ransomed, the rest, being thirteen thousand were fold together with the plunder. This victory was very glorious of great and sudden concernment, for hereupon many Towns on that coast, some far distant, call out the Carthaginian Garrisons and submitted themselves to the Romans. The Jetines began, and their example was followed by the Soluntines, Petrites, Tyndantans and others. Affairs being thus transacted, and a Garrison left at Panormus, the Consul returned to Missana and so to Rome. The Carthaginians lying in wait for them at their return, surprized some ships of Burthen with many in them.

At Rome there were two Naval Triumphs made immediately one after another, by the former year Consuls (whose command was prorogued) over the Culluars and Carthaginians; Serv. Fulvius triumphed the thirteenth of the Calends of February, and M. Atilline the day after. The five hundred year after the foundation of the City a fruitless expedition was made into Africa. Cn. Servilius Ca. F. (Cn. N. Capio), and Cn. Sempronius Ti. F. Ti. N. Blias being Consuls, crossed over into Sicily, where having in vain attempted Lathemus, they directed their course to Africa with two hundred and three thousand ships, and falling along the coast and soentimes landing, they took many Towns and got great plunder. They effected nothing of greater moment, being hindered of entering into the most convenient Towns by the Carthaginians who everywhere met them with very good courage, having recovered whatever M. Regularus had possessed, and punished the revolters. For Hamilcar having ranged through Numidia and Maurystania, had reduced and quieted all that Tract, imposing a fine of a thousand Talents of silver, and twenty thousand Oxen, and punishing the prime men who were thought to favour the Romans, three thousand whereof were Crucified. But the enemies encounter was not so formidable to the Romans as their own ignorance in the places, and their dangers in the sea, for failing to Messana, an Island of the Lipthagi, near unto the lesser Syria, they struck upon shallow places, the Tide going out, and were detained till the ships being emptied of their burthens, were by the Tide coming in again relieved from extreme danger. Having therefore escaped so great a diftrefs, and fearing those dangerous places, without delay they sailed away as if they fled, not that no lefse a calamity attended them than what they had avoided. To Panormus indeed they returned very safe, but in their Voyage to Italy, as they failed about the Promontory of Palunsium, which reacheth out into the sea from the Lucanian Mountains, a terrible storm arising fank above three thousand great ships, together with many horse-boats and vessels of Burthen. The City being exceedingly grieved at such frequent losses, as if the very winds and water denied the Romans the Sovereignty of the sea, the Senate decreed that their Navy should confit but of three thousand ships, for the guard of Italy and transportation of provisions to their Army in Sicily. Nevertheless this misfortune hindered not one of the Consuls C. Sempronius from his Triumph over the Carthaginians on the Calends of April, ten days after Cn. Cornelius Proconful made the like Triumph. There were Cenfors that year created at Rome, but L. Pufullimius L. F. L. N. Megellas (who was likewise then Pretor) dying in his Office, the other Cenfor D. Junius D. F. D. N. Terra did also lay down his Office.

The next Summer C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Costa, and P. Servilius C. F. Cn. N. Geminius being Consuls, crossed over into Sicily, and amongst other Towns took Himera (upon the River Himera) but void of Inhabitants, whom in the night time the Carthaginians had carried away. Yet it was a great advantage to have the possession of so considerable a place, and hereby the Romans wiped away that disgrace which they had heretofore received at this City, for they had failed of their expectation of taking this City (named likewise Therma) by the couetoules of their fouldiers. For a certain Captive within the City, to whom was committed the custody of one of the Gates, that he might thereby recover his liberty, did upon an appointed night give admittance to the Roman Souldiers, who were sent to take possession of the City. When the chief of them were entered, they desiring to ingrof the richest spoils unto themselves, gave order, To have the Gates flung again and no more men to be let in. Whereupon the Thermitans receiving an Alarme took arms, and the Romans by reason of their small number not able to relief, and having no relief from their Friends, whom they had thus out, were rewarded according to their Folly, being every man of them slain. Himeras being thus reduced into the Roman Power, C. Aurelius the Conful thinketh of besieging Lipara, which had been so often in vain attempted: And in order thereunto gatheredeth together the choicest Foulidours they had in all Sicily, and borrowing ships of Hiero, transporteth them into the Liparans land. From whence having occasion to return to Messana, to consult the Enteraile of Sacrifices, he deputed his Lieutenant in the siege his Kinman P. Aurelius Pecuniola (some sayจ. Cafius a Colonell) with order, diligently to defend the Works, but otherwise not to fight at all: But he, not observing the Conulls advice, and thinking it would much redund to his Credit, to take Lipara in his absence, made an Assault upon the City, and that to his Cost; for, not being able to Muster it, he lopt many men, and by a fall out of the Town had one of his Forts set on fire, having also much ado to defend his Camp. But upon the return of Aurelius, Fortune wheeling about, there was a very great slaughter made at the taking of the City, after which he proceeded to the punishment of the Colonel, whom he commanded to be beaten with fpirit, and take pay among the common Foulidours, a very remarkable severity, whereof he made some other prooves in the time of his Confulship. When Lipara was taken, an Immunity was granted to the Posterity of Timafiches (once Governor of these places) that they should for ever be free from all Taxes and tribute; wherein the Romans manifestted the constancy of their Thankfulness, not to be outworne by time; because when the Pirates of Lipara had taken a Golden Cup, which they had sent to Apollo of Delphi, Timafiches causd both it, and the Embassadors who convinced it, to be safely conducted into Greece, and the Men back again to Rome.

The Romans afterward besieging Eryga a very strong Calle, with forty thousand foot, and a thousand Horse, were neither able to take it, neither durst they fight with the Carthaginians: For since the misfortune of M. Regulas, the Romans stood too much in fear of the Elephants that they always avoided Battell. Oftimes within the Territories of Lilybaum, and oft in the Selinuntian fields, they have stood in Battell-array about half a mile from the Enemy, yet durst neither venture according to their wonted Courage, to begin the Charge, or defend into plain and open ground, but still kept themselves in craggy and difficult places. The Carthaginians hereupon erecting their Spirit, (seeing they now had Confidence in their land Army, and knew the Romans had had greater lasses by tempests at Sea, then themselves by unluckie fights, especially having intelligence of the Senate's Resolution to set out no more Navies) conceived hopes of recovering Sicily, if they did but send good force of land and sea-forces thither. But their main impediment was want of Money, the late continual Warrs having exhausted their Old store, and confirmed their new raised Taxes. They sent therefore Embassadors to Tidomy King of Egypt, to borrow two thousand Talents of Money. The King being loath to offend either them, or the Romans (being both in League with him) offered himself as a Mediator of Peace between them: But notwithstanding all their promises he denied the Carthaginians Request saying, He would willingly help a Friend against an Enemy, but thought it not fit to assist one Friend against another. About the same time at Rome Trib. Commissaries was the first of the Plebeians who was created Chief Priest. The same year also Censors were created, because the Duties of that Office could not last year be performed, one of the Censors dying, and the other laying down his Commision, M. Valerius M. F. M. N. Maximus Messala, and P. Sempronius P. F. P. N. Sophus made the seven and thirtie Lustration. Two hundred ninety seven thousand, seven hundred ninety seven Citizens were rated. This was a fad and severe Censorship, for in taking a view of the Senate, Thirty were degraded, four hundred young Knights had their horses taken away, and made common stipendary Foulidours. This came to pass by the Complaint of C. Aurelius the Conful, who informed the Censors, That in Sicily, when need required, being commanded to their Duty, they had refused to obey. The Conful, not content with this Revenge for their contempt of Discipline, prevailed likewise with the Senate to keep back their Pay. And truly as times then went, the consideration of his Severity and strictnes of Discipline, as well as his exploits performed, was occasion of his Triumph made over the Carthaginians and Sicilians upon the 1st of April. The next year was fuller of Threats, then action: For great preparations being made on both sides, and each standing in some fear of the other, the whole summer passed away without any considerable thing done. L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus, and C. Furins C. F. C. N. Pacius, being Confuls, transporting their Legions over into Sicily, neither themselves much provoked the Enemy, or were provoked by them, though Afterword a new Carthaginian Generall was lately come thither with two hundred ships, an hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thousand Horse and Foot. This business causd the Senate to enter into Consulfation of preparing another Navy; for the Publick Treasures began to be exhausted by protratching the Warre, and since the Misfortune of M. Regulus, the Legions degenerated from their wonted Valour, and though all things should succeed prosperously at Land, yet 'twas manifest, the Carthaginians could not be kept off Sicily, so long as they had the sovereignty of the Seas. Refusing therefore their former resolutions, they began to put confidence again in their ships, and with all care, to trimme the old, and build new ones. In the mean time L. Metellus being left at Panormum, C. Furins return'd to Rome, to the chusing of the new Conuls, who were C. Atelins C. M. F. M. N. Regulus, and and L. Munius A. F. P. N. Deus, to there was committed the charge of preparing the Navy and men for the ships; L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commission to manage the War in Sicily as Proconsul.

A. Drabell understanding that one of the Romans Generals was absent with half their forces, and computing with himself, that though the Armies had long flood in Battel-array one against the other, the Roanass had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own fouldiers who accused him of cowardize, he drew all his forces out of the City, and after a long and difficult march through the Sicilian Territories, he invaded those of Panormus and there pitched his Camp. It fortun'd, that the Proconsul, with the remainder of the Roman strength was then at Panormus to guard their Associates, now heart grown on, in recaping and carrying in their grain. He, having intelligence that some of the enemies spies lay secretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Assembly, then giving order they should examine one another, and question those who were least known, what they were, or what business they had at Panormus, found out those spies and seized on them. By them he underflood the enemies designs, and observing there was more rafhefis then good counsel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himself within the works of the City, that fo he might encrease their foolishe confidence. Whereupon A. Drabell growing bolder, advanced his forces, spoothing and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconsul regarded neither the loss sustained nor the disgrace about redounding, foreseeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians would sufficiently satisfie him for both with good Ule. Above all, he thought good to expect till they crossed the River Orthone, which runneth on the South side of the Town, and then he had contrived a pure and fudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to signific his fear, so he placed but few fouldiers upon the walls, deiring that the enemy should not understand either the courage or number of his men. This counfel succeeded according to his expectation, both the enemy by his confidence, and fortune by a fudden chance furthering the design: For A. Drabell Forde the River with his Foot, Horde and Elephants, and planted his Camp close under the walls of the City, with fo much contempt of the enemies cowarde, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of ditch or bulwark.

Thither the Sutlers and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank freely, and elevating their voices according to their several dialects, in much noise and confusion gave good notice of their present temper, that they were not very sober. Then did the Proconsul think the fittest time to fend those his men who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it succeeded so happily, that till funding out by degrees fresh supplies, A. Drabell's whole Army at length came out of the Camp. L. Cecilius the Proconsul placeth part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, if the Elephants approached to fling their darts at them, and if they found themselves force prevailed to retire into the Trench, and then come out again to a frefh charge. The mean Artificers and common Sort he commanded to carry darts and weapons, and fling them over the wall that the light armed men should not want plenty of them. Himself with his companies completely armed, stood in Rank and File within the gate over against the enemies right Wing. They who were already engaged sometimes being overpowered'd in number retreated in good order, sometimes being affiled by supplies from the Town did maintain the fight. When the Recorders of the Elephants defining in emulation to seem Authors of the Victory as well as A. Drabell, and advancing with their beasts, beat back those who opposed them, and rashly pressing upon them (as they retired toward the City) came up even to the Trench. But then a shower of Arrows flying from the walls, and fresh light armed men assailing them with Spears and Darts, the Elephants being wounded began to rage, and betaking themselves which way ever aanger and pain led them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and disorder'd whole companies of armed men.

Whereupon the Proconsul crying, This is the time of the long look's for Victory, iffue out, and being fresh and in good rank had an eafe victory over the confused multitude of the enemy; there was a great slaughter made both in the field and in the pursuit, their calamity being encraeted by a sudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them: For about the same time the Carthaginian Navy appearing at shire, the whole multitude trembling and blind with fear, promiscuously ran thither as to the only refuge, in which hurry burly many were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to swim, and many too hastily scaling the ships and tumbling down perished in the sea. Neither before this time nor after it, amongst all their prosperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glorious; whereby the Romans returned their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was so disheartened with fear, that they call off not only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army so long as that War lasted.

Twenty thousand Carthaginians are said to be slain, fix and twenty Elephants were presently taken, and afterward all the rest. For the Proconsul thinking it hard for his ignorant men to catch the beasts being looke and enraged, commanded a Cryer by Proclamation to promise, Liberty and safety to any prisoner by whose means the Elephants should be taken, hereby laying first
That hold on those who were most gentle and familiar, by their help they easily brought in the reft. L. Munetius sent them all to Rome, having invented a pretty way for their transportation: for his ships not being fit for the purpose, he gathered and bound together many Hogheads, fastening a Rafter between every two that they should neither dash together nor yet part one from the other, then planking them over, spreading earth and dust upon them, and erecting walls on each side in the form of tiles, the Elephants otherwise very fearful of fasting by water, entred them and were safely conveyed to Rhægium.

A druball from this overthrow escaped to Lilybaean but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now considering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lost except Lilybaean and Drepanus, that the Romans having again set out a Navy, were very potent both at land and sea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembered M. Regulus and the conditions he once proposed to them, and perfuaded that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at leaft for what they next desired, an exchange of prisoners, nothing doubting but that for his own sake he would effectually interpose himself in such a busines: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Gaole, and desire to fee his dearest relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus had a wife and children at Rome, friends and kindred in the Senate and publick offices, a Consul German now Conful, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pitied for his affilitions; if therefore he beareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in presenting, or is more likely by favour to effect such a design:
He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or desire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in perfon the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joyned with the Carthaginian Embassadors, when he was come to the City, he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alledging,
The Confitute of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The Senate being accordingly assembled, he amongst the Carthaginian Embassadors delivered his Meffage, That himself being by the War a servant to the Carthaginians, had command from his Caufers to propound chiefly, That the war may be concluded upon what terms should seem fit to both parties, or what at leaft an exchange of prisoners would be granted. The Embassadors presently withdrawing, he likewise accompanied them; neither, though he was earnestly solicited, would be present in the Senate at the debate of the busines for the Carthagians attended to
it. Then leaving silent till his opinion was required, he thus expreffed himself, *Confidere Fathers, I am told a Roman: my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it, is in the power of the enemies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is still the fame. Following therefore the reason of my Son, which is my own, rather then the inclinations of my Body, which is another's, my advice is, You would neither exchange prisoners nor conclude a peace. For to refolve the Captives while the war continue is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold but my faith who am an old man, have many, and those young, amongst which are some I no way to be despaired. And to end the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wisdom, so it is perrnicious to the Commonwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs can be transacted without great pains and coll: But if you rightly consider the state of Carthage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We were indeed once overcame in a great Battel, whether it was my fault or fortunes; but we have so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, by the Victory at Panormus, presse-lined to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, except one or two Cities, and in the other Islands their condition is naught. You have a Navy which they dare not encounter, so that in that part of the war ye are also superiors. And the losses ye have sustained by Tempest hath not bereaved you of so much strength as it hath taught you Circumpection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both sides; but the Italians are more obedient to you then are the Africans to the Carthagians, whom as they never truly loved, so have they of late learnt to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked by any such injury they revolted freely to me, but now since their former masters have waited their Grounds plundered their Cartel, exalted their Monies and slain their Nobles, what do you think they can more desire, then that a new Army would come from hence into Africa?

Barbarians, a Brutish and flattering sort of men, will be deterred by Cruelties so often exercised upon their Fellowes, who have been sometimes murthered by hangmen, or their fellow Souls, sometimes exposed into barren and uninhabited lands, receiving instead of the pay they have sought, most inhuman punishments, and horrible deaths. And this Conict to Fathers is my Opinion, that neither Peace is to be made with Carthage, nor yet an exchange of Prisoners granted.

This Counsell displeased not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the safety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himself for the Common good, the more they pitied him, and manfully inclined upon any terms whatsoever to restore to Gallant and Generous Peron to his Country. And voices were given out, that seeing he was now so happily retureed from foreign Captivity, he might lawfully tarry in the City, or be detained there. The High Priest likewise affirmed, that he might stay, without incurring the guilt of Perjury. But he to the Amazement of the Senate it fell, with a fierce Spirit, and svere Countenance, proceeded, saying, why do ye not resolve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. Ye in vain attempt that which will be neither pleasing to your selves, nor profitable to the Country, nor honest in me. For supposa, for a while ye would be willing and joyful to fee me amongst you, when once the short spurt of this affection is vanished, the Eafemens of my Return will make me more odious to you, then my abilence made firable. For the part I am resolved not to live in that City, where after an African slavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of a honest Citizen, and if I should defe the, my ifediy would hinder it, the remembrance of my faced Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I affured the Carthaginians of my return. And should I forswear my felle, I fear that Revenge would be taken not only on me, but on your selves, and the whole Roman People alfo. The Gods, believe me, are no vain things, and will not without Punishment be affronted by the Perjuries and Contempt of Man. If any one be of opinion that in Religion I may be abolifh'd, that the books of the Augustus mention expiaions of fuch crimes, and that Attonement may be made by Ceremonies and Sacrifices for Perjury and Trefsion; I would have him understand the Majesty of the Gods is more fierce, then being offended by Perjury, to be appeased by any Inventions of Men, neither is it agreeable to Reafon, that a Guift contracted by the fins of man, should be washed away with the blood of Beasts. As for my felle, I am not ignorant that great and exquisite torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a truth, I think to be worfe then all of them, for this would indeed hurt me, as for the Torments they hurt only something about me. Think not that man miferable who is able to endure misery. Slavery, Reproach, Contempt, Griefe, Hunger and Watching, I never yet esteemed evil, but now by a long fuffer they have left off to be troublesome to me. That they are tolerable, I have learnt by suffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not to be born by Man, Death will quickly free me not only from them, but from all other Calamitics. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not Death, which is eafe at any time to obtain, and cruelty I bad inflicted it on my felle, but that I thought it the part of a man rather to overcomeorrow than to avoid it. I have fpoke these few and confused words, that ye may understand I am not to be perfuaded from my Opinion, and withall that you should not bewaie me as an unfortunate and miferable Man: My Resolution is easy and conftant: 'Tis my care to return to Carthage, what I shall there suffer I leave to the Gods.

'Tis reported that the more effectually to move them he affirmed, that before he was diismis'd from Carthage, they had given him a gentle Poison, which by low degrees feeding on his vital spirits, would consume him after the exchange was made. Wonderfull was the confidence of this Man, who, rather than fwyve from the Rule of Honelty, did with more earneftnefs pursue Contumelies, Torments and Death, then others avoid them, a true and profitable Leffon to Poffcrrity. That those men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are confiant in their honel revolutions, who have a fene of their own nobility, and think themselves borne not onely for this world. For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone to great miferies, if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great punishment for evil Men. The Senate therefore having made a Decree according to the opinion of M. Regulus, he with a felci countenance followed his Sullen and angry Malters, by whom it appeared that they would cruelly revenge the indignity of their repufion upon his Perfon, info much as many were moved to detain him against his will. Moreover his Wife Marcia, and his Children making Lamentable complaints, the Confals faid, if he carried they would not deliver him up, neither would they hinder his going. So he refusing to difcourse with his Wife, and avoiding the Embraces and kifles of his little Children, was carried back to Carthage, where with cruel tortures he was put to death. For cutting off his Eyelids, they kept him awhile in a dark place, then in the heat of the Sunne they suddenly brought him out, and forced him to look up into the sky, at length they put him into a wooden chiet (right over against the Sun) full of nails on the inside, and so narrow that he was forced alwayes to stand upright; if at any time he leant on one fide to ease his weary body, he was prick'd and goaded with the nails, and in torment and continual watching yielded up the Ghost.

This was the end of M. Attius Regulus, much more glorious then his Life, though long led with with great honesty and Honour: He was a man of great Integrity of Manners, of an Invincible Spirit, and for his Counsell not to be despised, wherein neither his own nor after ages could accuse him, but that he seemed not very moderately to bear his prosperous Fortune, and that by denying the Carthaginians request he was the occasion of the wars continuance for many years after the great detriment of both Cities. But he wiped off this his fault by his other many egregious virtues, and chiefly by his wonderful constancy at his death, being more happy in suffering calamities then if he could have avoided it. The Senate hearing the news of his death, and the Barbarous cruelty of the Carthaginians, delivered up the Noblest of the Captives to Marcus and her children, whom they shut up in an Engine throut through with sharp irons, resolving to put them to the like death as Regulus had suffered; for five whole dayes they had no food allowed them, in which Bostrar with grief and hunger pined to death; Hamilton being stronger in body continued five dayes longer, but together with the carcasse of Bostrar, with sufficiency sufficient only to prolong his miserable life. Till at length the Magistrates understanding what was in doing, did restrain their cruelty, commanding that the Affies of Bostrar should be conveyed into his own Country, and that the other prisoners should be handled with more mercy. Whereby appears a remarkable difference of manners in the two Cities, in that the one being not unjustly offended, nor able with security to offend, with horrid punishments extinguisht that virtue they ought to have reverence, the other mitigated a most just revenge not regarding their own enraged grief, but the Rules of Humanity, and that moderation which becometh Illustrious Empires.

BOOK IX.

Upon the departure of the Carthaginian Embassadors, the Consuls having Order from the Senate to transport their Army into Sicily, did very readily obey, being highly incensed against the enemy for M. Regulus his fake, and likewise provoked with emulation and conceiving great hopes from the Victory of L. Metellus Proconsul. For they measured not the greatness of thebufinesse so much by the loss of the Carthaginians, who were much weakened by the loss of an Army and so many Elephants, but chiefly they were encouraged because the soldiers, having successfully fought against the beasts, did now no more stand in fear of them. And hopes were conceived the war might suddenly be finished if opportunities were not neglected. The Consuls therefore with a Navy of two hundred ships, and four Legions failed to Panormus, where taking in likewise the other forces and ships (unless what were left for the guard and security of some places) they went to Lilybaeum with 240 Banked ships, threescore Barks of a shorter size, called Cereri, and many other vessels of all sorts, with resolution to make an assault upon it. This is that famous ege of Lilybaeum, which beginning the fourteenth year of this war, lasted full ten years and at length was ended, neither with the surprise of the City, nor with its surrender, but together with the whole War. For both the Romans and Carthaginians well understanding of what concernment that City was, either to the Guard of the African Coast, or the Empire of Sicily, did with all their might, the one one assault, the other defend it. The Triumph of L. Metellus did somewhat comfort the City of Rome, after their sorrow for C. M. Regulus, not only with the memory and consideration of their successes, but with the sweetness of Revenge also over so cruel and inhumane a People: He Triumphed Proconsul over the Carthaginians, the seventh of the Ides of September, thirteen of the Enemies Commanders were led before his Chariot, and a great troop of Elephants, even an hundred and Twenty, some reckon many more. These being afterwards produced when the Games were celebrated, were chased up and down the Circus with spearheads headed with iron, that the People might accustom themselves to contemplate those beasts they had hereofore so terribly feared. (Vir. Plac. attimes they were all slain, the Romans not caring to make use of them themselves, and thinking it no way for the advantage of the Common-wealth, to make a Present of so considerable a Strength to any Prince. The same year Corn was very cheape at Rome, a bushell for a penny, at the same price was sold a gallon of wine, thirty pound of dried figs, ten pounds of oil, and twelve pound of flesh. For there was greater Church of the Commodities not of money, which by the long-continuance of warre grew very scarce. While these things hapned at Rome, the Confuls in Sicily assaulted Lilybaen with all their Strength, and the besieged as flautly refilled. The first attempt was against a Tower, which stood fast toward the Lybian Sea, this being demolished, they did by degrees proceed to those which were next, till they had destroyed fix. For the more easy battering of the reit they began to fill up the Trenches, that they might draw over and plant their Engines. Though the labour were very great (for the ditch was three hundred cubits broad, and forty deep) they did readily set upon and diligently promote the work. The Carthaginians to hinder their design, made holes on the inside of the Trench, out of which they called the rubbidge again, but, the heapes still encreasing, and the ditch at length made even with the ground; (by reason of the multitude of Laboures) they changed their Counsell, and erected another wall within the former: Himilco being at all Works indefatigable, who besides the multitude of inhabitants in the City, had ten thousand Mercenaries, and did by his wisdom, Vigilance and constancy elude and overcome all the Enemies force and Stratagems. He suffered nothing to be out of order among his own men, nor any thing to be secure on the Enemies part; he built Work against Work, digged Mine against Mine, opposed Armes to Armes, sometimes he flouted forth, fighting with such resolution, that in these tumultuary skirmishes there were sometimes slain little fewer, then usually fall in let Battells.

The Romans undermining the Foundation of the Walls, Himilco made his countermove against the place where he observed the Romans to call out earth, and opening their Mine he sent in forthwith a Band of Armed foudliers, who set upon the naked Romans bute at work, and slew a great number; and as many were burnt with brush faggots (thrown into the Trench and set on fire) while they approached the Walls to help their fellows. Notwithstanding fear and concernment of mind encreased among the besieged, whereby some Mercenary Commanders taking advantage, and pretending want of pay, plotted to betray the City to the Romans, nothing doubting but that they could easilie induce every man his foudliers to approve of the design. On a certain night therefore shippinc out of the Town into the Roman Camp, they declared the state of the City, and what they had intended; Amongst all the other Mercenaries at Lilybaen, there was one Alexen at Achaia, a Man not unskilful in Martiali Affaires, and of singular Integrity: He understanding the Traitors design, without delay discoveres it to Himilco, Himilco as in a great and imminent danger, immediately summons together all the Mercenary Commanders, who were yet in the Town, declares to them what was in agitation, and by whom, and vehemently inveighing against them, he exhorts those who are present, not to become partners in the rafhnes and Treachery of others, that persevering in their Duty, they should find all fair dealing from the Carthaginions, their Pay should be certain, and great Rewards moreover accumulated, that if they taunted themselves with the infamous crime of Treason, they would be hateful to God and man, withall, as much money as in heat and fear he could at present raife, he distributs among them, promising that, himilco would take care to see the Common foudliers pay asonne as may be discharged.

An Oration made in seafon, hath certainly great power over the Minds of men, especially if the gravity of the speake be mixed with truth and sincerity to be relied upon: Every one attented to what Himilco spake, and cheerfully offered their utmost endeavours to continue their foudliers in their Duty. Himilco commending them, and furthermore encouraging them with hopes, commands every one to apply himselfe to his own Companies, and endeavour to keep them in subjection: He fendeth likewise along with them Hanniball, the son of Hanniball, who rered in Saratina, and Alexen the Achaian; Hanniball to the Gauls, with whom he was acquainted, and very gratious, by Reaon of his former conversation with them in the War; Alexen to other Mercenaries of severall Nations, by all whom he was equally beloved. Thee engaging their Words, that whatsoever Himilco had promised should be performed, so effectually made up the busines, that the Traitors a while after returning to the Walls, were not only kept out, but beaten back with darts, and reproached for their Villany. So they returning to the Confuls without effecting their Design, were nevertheless rewarded with Gifts, and had Land in Sicily beloued on them.

Thus did the fidelity of Alexen at that time support the Carthaginian Affaires, brought almolt into a desperate condition by this Treason: He had before likewise preferred the Agrigentines, which the Mercenaries of Syracusae had by the like wickedness plotted to betray, and therefore deserveth to have his memory and praiseth recorded in History.

The Befieged were afterward much encouraged by the coming of new Auxiliaries. For the Carthaginians, though they were ignorant of what had hapned at Lilybaem, did judge it fit to carry on affairs with much Vigour, therefore they commanded Aderbal the Admiral to provide a Navy and convey Men, Money, and Corne to Lilybaem. By him was sent Himilch the fon of Hamilcar, who having a fresh gale of wind from the Egyptian lands, failed directly into the port of Lilybaem, his men ready armed for fight, and resolving to break through all opposition. The Romans had from the beginning of the siege stopped up the mouth of the haven by sinking fifteen ships, which they had for that purpose laden with stones, being therefore suddenly overtaken with the Enemies haft, and fearing left themselves might by the force of the winds be driven into the port, a place made unsafe for Navigation, they did not at all oppose the Enemy. Himilch safely entered the Harbour, and landing his men to the number of ten thousand, was received into the City with very great joy of the Lilybatsans. The Romans seeing they could not prevent the Enemies Arrival, entered into Conflutation how to defend their Works, which they thought Himilch would not delay to set upon, having so great a recruit of fresh soldiers; neither were they deceived, for Himilch intending to make use both of his new strength and of the Courage of the others now revived, summons all his forces together, and by hopes of Victory and ample rewards persuades them to make a fallie, and haveing disposed his Companies as the Occasion required, by break of day he assaulted the Romans works in many places. The Romans were provided for them, and where they feared most danger had placed strong Guards, with these a very sharp fight was begun, many fell on both sides, for they fought with great Courage and Resolution, and the number of men was great on each part, no less than twenty thousand issued out of the City, and were opposed by a greater Multitude of the Befiegers. For the Confuls having raised Auxiliaries from their friends in Sicily, were above an hundred thousand strong, whereof threefour thousand were employed in the siege, the Residue being sent abroad to bring in Provisions. The fight therefore being very hot in every place, the sharpest Contention was about the Engines, some striving to spoil them, others to defend them, with so great Vehemence, that they spared their own lives no more then their Enemies. A great number of slaine men lay in that station where the Aptaffaitt first began, the Clamour and noise of the Warriors, and Terrore of the Battall were much encreased by another Company, which brake out, with links and torches, rushing through all dangers and Deaths, to set fire on the Engines; and the Roman soldiers were very eager giving place to the fierce enemys of the Enemies, as no longer able to defend their Engines. But Himilch seeing many of his men perished, and the Romans as yet nothing to remit of their Courage in resifting, found a Retreat, and went first out of the Battall. Neither did the Romans pursue him, being content they had preferred their works which were almost given for lost.

The next night Himilch, while the Enemy was weary after the fight, and observed not his Motion, secretly stole out of the Harbour with the ships he came in, and went to Aderbal at Drepanus, carrying along with him the Horfemen, who being of no use to the besieged in a close place, he rightly judged might otherwise be better employed. Thefe making frequent excursions from Drepanus, infelted the high ways, obstructed the Convenience of provisions, surprized many forragers who straggled far from the Camp, afflicted the Roman Associates with all kinds of misery, and very much confounded the counfells and designs of the Confuls. Aderbal likewise much perplexed them at sea, suddenly falling sometimetime on the Sicilian, sometime on the Italian shore, leaving nothing unattempted whereby he might mischiefe the Romans. Hence it came to passe that there was great scarcity in the Roman Camp, for they had almoft no food left but onely the flesh of beasts, many died of Famine, and many more, as is usual in such cafes, of Diseases; whereupon many thousands perished, and therefore it was concluded that one of the Confuls with his Legions should return to Rome to the Assembly of the People, that the other Befiegers might have the greater Plentye. After this the Romans again with greater pains and diligence endeavoured with earth and stones to stop up the mouth of the Haven, fortifying the Damme on both sides with strong pieces of timber joynd together cross-ways, and fastened with iron Anchors, to containe the heap of earth and stones from washing away: But their labour though great proved fruitlesse, for the sea was so deep, that whatsoever was flung in, was carried aside before it lighted right, and upon the sailing of Tempefts, the Tide being very violent, destroyed their Work.

But the very fame of the Work did for a time keep the Haven block'd up, which very mucch troubled the Carthaginians: that they could now by no means hold intelligence with their friends, neither durst any man undertake to visit the Lilybatsans and give an account of their Condition, till at length one Himilch sentnamed Rhodus ingaged himself to enter the City, and having viewed all things, to returne with a faithful Account. The promis pleased the Carthaginians: but they had little faith in it; because they knew beside the heapes of rubbishes, that the Haven was watched and warded by the Roman ships at Anchor there: But he having rige a private ship he had, failed to one of the islands over against Lilybaem, and the next day having a favourlable wind, at ten of the clock in the day time, openly in the face of the enemy wondring at his confidence entered the Haven. But the Conful to intercept him in his return, in the night time placed ten choice ships on each side the Haven, five as near the mouth as might be. Hannibal trusting in the swiftness of his Vessel came out in the day time; the Romans were ready in the expectation of him, and with all their endeavors set forward again him, but he was so much too quick for them, that not containing to escape he moreover insulted over them, sometimes failing, sometimes wheeling about as if he would challenge them to fight. When he had often used this bold exploit, it proved of great advantage to the Carthaginian affairs, in that the Besieged were infinitely comforted with meffages from their friends, in that at Carthage they daily understood the flate and progress of things at Lilybaum as occasion required, and in that the Romans were so much ashamed and madded at the rashneffe of the men which they could not revenge. He was much helped in his desig by his knowledge of the Channel and the paffages thereabouts; for between thole Fenny and moonlight places whereby is the paffage to Lilybaum, he diligently observed a very safe and true course for his ship. For when he came from the main Sea withinfight of the City, he turned his ship, that the Stern of it was toward Italy, and from the Foredeck the Tower of Lilybaum which was upon the shore, hindered the flight of all other Towers toward Africa, and this is the only safe way of entering the Harbour with full fail.

And now many more being encouraged by the boldnes and success of Hannibal, began to correspond with Lilybaum, till at length by a certain chance a veftel of great swiftness was taken, for though in other places the Romans Dams were carried away by the winds and water, yet in one place, where the Sea was somewhat shallow, they ftood firm; there the ship finking and being detained was taken by the Romans, and being furnished with ftruck fouldiers and good rowers proved the ruine of Hannibal. For having entered the City in the night time and returning in the open day, he fped this fhips every where waiting upon his motion, whereupon apprehending danger, at firft he fled, but that being in vain, he made fame opposition and was taken by the Romans.

The Romans being possessed of this ship, and observing the fame courfe of entering the Haven, did afterward early hinder any other vefsels from failing to Lilybaum. The Besiegers began now very fiercely to intend their main busines, and affaulting one of the Works near the Seet, drew the whole company of the besieged to defend that pide where the form was made, whereby opportunity was given to other forces who were referred for that purpofe to make an affault upon the contrary part and take the outward wall; but this proved in vain, for the Carthaginian General feafonably coming with a fupply of choice men, beat the Romans out with great flaughter. Another greater fortune gave the Besiegers hope of the univerfal Victory; there arose by chance very great gulfs of wind, which as it were on fett purpose blew hard upon the Romans works, faking their very Rampires, and tumbling down the Towers built thereon. The townifmen were not ignorant of this, and thought now an opportunity given them by the gods of firing the Romans Engins, which they had fo often in vain fubaffaulted. The Subfance of the Engins was very apt to take fire, having been long felled and dried with the heat of the Sun. The Romans were not fack in defending themselves, but not to much purpofe, for the enemy was directed by the light of the fire which had feizs on the Engins, and affifted with the strength of the wind to call their darts more furely and with greater force, the others received no lea hinderance and danger thereby, then by the weapons of the enemies, for the wind being fierce and againft the Romans blew fmoke, and flame, and afs into their mouths and eyes, and brought the enemies darts with greater violence upon them, whereas themselves by reafon of darkneffe were uncertain whither to direct their frokes, and by reafon of the vehemency of the gulfs were not well able to stand. So that all the Roman Engins and works either for digging of mines or battering the walls were every one confumed by this fire.

Then was all hopes laid aside of taking Lilybaum by force, and the fieghe had been prefently raised but that Hiero, sending plenty of Corn and provision, perfwaded the Romans to try, where not intending to make any more storms upon the City, they did on every fide fence their Camp, reolving to commit the ifue of things to Time and Fortune. The Besiegers likewise building up what part of their walls had been battered, were now the more encouraged to endure the fieghe hereafter. These news were very fadly entertained at Rome, nevertheless they determined by war to make up what losses by war they had fulfilled, and their resolution here-in was fo inmoveable, that, 'tis faid, a Senator was lain in the very Court because he made mention of Peace. Great preparations were now made, and a new leavy of ten thoufand Rowers fent into Sicily, for they had fulfilled a great lofe of them. The Consuls were P. Clodius Ap. F.C.N. Pulcher, and L. Junius C.F. C.N. Pullus. 'Tis fallcly by some delivered, that this Clodius was the fon of C squo. He, when he was come into Sicil, and had taken pofteflion of the Army at Lilybaum, assembled the Souldiers together, and harp.ly reprehended the prefent Consuls, That by their idleness and luxury they had trifted away time before Lilybaum more like men besieged their besiegers, without any fruit, and to the lafe and difhonour of the Roman Majesty. He was a ver y crabbcd lowr man, and being Violent by Nature, and Arrogant by reafon of his Nobility, he was apt to let fall Speeches and perform Actions not well becoming a serious lober man. He was very severe in punifhing, letting paff no crime with pardon, but profeccuting even the very small lest with too great severity; himself in matters of the greatest moment miserably failing, even to madness. For he followed the former Consuls course which he had so sharply condemned in damming up the Haven, and (what argued greater folly) he rashly and inconsiderately alloying

The Conful, who had failed in the Rere before, now changing his Station, came back to all and placed himself in the left Wing; but the Carthaginians failing by the enemies left Wing with five Beaked ships, staked about facing the Romans, and had the open sea on his back, other ships as they came he commanded to place themselves at a convenient distance, and when all were order'd according to his mind he set the forward against the enemy. And now sign of Battles being given from both the Admirals they fiercely encounter on all sides, at first with equal hopes, but afterward to the Carthaginians better fortune. For though they had the lesser number of ships to wit, but ninety armed, in other respects they did exceed, for their ships were better and their water-men more skilful; they had likewise made choice of a most convenient place of fight, for as often as they were hard put to it they had free egress into the open sea, where they could easily by their swiftness avoid the enemy, or if he long pursu'd them, return and encompass him. But the Romans being so near the shore had not the like conveniences, they could neither fall into the main nor with safety well retire, but as often as the enemy pressed upon them, they either flee in the lands or endanger'd themselves upon the open sea. Being therefore unable to break through the enemy by force and charge him in the Rere, by reason of the swiftness of their ships and unskillfulness of the Rower, and being cooped up in a narrow place not able from the Stern to help their fellow's who were in danger, they were beaten to the Carthaginians little loss.

To these difficulties was added another cause of despair from their Religion, and they thought themselves worl'd by the anger of the gods, because the Conful undertook to fight contrary to the indication of the Birds, adding likewise a fear to his negligence; for because the Chickens did not eat, he commanded them to be flung into the sea, that they might drink though they would not feed. This occurrence made the soldiers more slack and faint hearted, fighting, as they thought, with the ill will of the gods. But the author of all this calamity, when he had lost every thing else, he wanted neither wit nor boldness to preserve himself, for when he saw his ships in such numbers sank and taken, he flit away between the shore and the enemy with thirty ships which flood near him. And that he might safely arrive to his Army at Lilybaun, being to fail by some of the Carthaginians Guards, he adorned his ships in token of Victory. The Carthaginians therefore imagining the Conful had been victorious, and that his other ships would suddenly follow, suffered him safely to pass by, being themselves much terrified and dejected. The enemy took all the ships the Conful left behind, even ninety and three, together with the Soulliders and Rower, except only those who striking upon the shore, cast themselves on land and fled. But in the fight a great number were sunk; for Clodius brought above two hundred from Lilybaun. This great victory colt the Carthaginians very little, for they lost not not a man, much less a ship, and very few are said to be wounded; of the Romans eight thousand men were slain, and twenty thousand taken.

About the same time likewise the Carthaginians took some ships laden with Corn from Ponimentum, and carried them to Drepanus, and carrying provisions into Lilybaenus, from the Territories of Drepanus, did plentifully relieve the besieged with accommodation of all sorts. Neither here did this year's fortune make a stop, but afflicted the Romans with another great calamity, whereby they lost not only the present possession of the sea, but all hopes of regaining it. For the other Consulf L. Junius coming out of Italy with many ships of war, laden with Corn for the Army, and fifty besked ships arrived at Messana, where he met with a great number of other Vessels, from the Army, and other parts of Sicily. Joining himself with these, he made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty long ships, almost eight hundred ships of burthen, and faileth to Syracuse. Being arrived thither, he hendeth the Navies before with part of the Navy to Lilybaenus; himfelfe remaneth at Syracuse, expecting thofe others from Messana, who were not able to overtak him, and taking in grain which his Midland friends brought down to the sea fide. In the mean time Adicball having nefc the Roman ships and Captives to Carthage (Fortune and Glory putting him forward to action) delivered thirtie ships more to Carthalo, who had brought feventy, with as many ships of Burthen from Africa, and fent him to drive out the Roman ships from the Haven of Lilybaenus, or to fire or fink them.

He at break of the day enting the Haven with great Terrou, fome ships he boorded, and others he fired, in the mean time Himica Governour of the City, made a fally with the Mercenaries upon thofe Romans who went to defend the ships, which caufed great fear in the Camp. In fine Carthalo having destroyed not very many, carried away five, and directed his Course to Heraclea. Lying there in wait to obftruct the Romans Voyage to Lilybaenus, he hearthe newes of a considerable Navy of all kinds of ships failing by.

He therefore joyning other Commanders with himfelfe, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty good ships, confiding in which Strength, and animated by former success, he pretently made a diftance out of the Haven to meet the Enemy. By the fhoore of Gela the Navys came in fight one of the other, but the Roman Queftors fearing a disadvantageous encounter, diverted their course to Phintidades, a Town in League with the Romans, at Phintidades there is no Haven, only the rocks running out into the sea afford a pretty safe riding for ships. Here the Romans landing, prepared themselves for the Enemies coming, having brought Engines of offence out of the Town, and placed them on the fhoore for safeguard of the ships. The Carthaginians at firft refolved to have beleaguer the Enemy, thinking that out of fear they would have fled into the Town, and have left their ships for a Prey; but when the Romans feed Prouously to their own defence, and that they found the fight full of danger, likewife not much trusting in a place somewhat void of the ships they defefed; and having taken a few Vessells laden with provifion they failed to the River Halycus, not farre diftant, there they healed their wounded men, obferving the motion of the Enemy. Other Writers following, I believe, Philus, affirme, that the Romans fuffrrd greater losf, that the Queftors being awacned at the firft fight of the Enemy in their fight to Phintidades left behind their fhips of burthen, and all other Vessells but men of Warre, that in the fight fifty round Vessells, and threfcore long ships were funk, and threfcore fo fpirit and fatterd, that they were made unfit for service.

Not long after the Carthaginians had abiding at the River Halycus, L. Junius the Conful, having done his business at Syracuse, failing toward Lilybaenus, about the Promontory of Pachynus, was discovered by some of Carthalo his fhips, who thereupon with all speed maketh out to meet him (being ignorant of all passages at Phintidades) that he might fight him as farre from Quafoe's Navy as might be, left they should come in for his succour. The Conful seeing the Enemy make up toward him, not daring to fight, nor being able to avoid them, drives his fhips into a rough and troubledome creek, near Cametrine, a greater fear overcoming this leffer, left his whole Army should fall into the Enemies Power. Carthalo not daring to venture into the place, takes up his fation at a certain Promontory, from whence he might equally intend himfelfe against either Navy. A while after, when the Winds blew high, the Carthagian fhips machers (skillfull in fuch Affairs) foreseeing a tempeft, perfwaded Carthalo to forfake that fation, and feere to Pachynus, and fo the Carthaginians, but not without great pains, averted the force of the Tempeft; but both the Roman Navys utterly perished upon the Rocks, in fome of that of the whole fhipwreck there remained not a piece of board of any fervice, excepting only two fhips, wherein the Conful with the small remainder of his men arrived at Lilybaenus. All the ships of provifion were loft, and above an hundred long ships; but part of the Army was faved, leaping into the sea and swimming to the shore. The Senate, who had lately called home P. Clodius the Conful, for his miscarriage in Sicily, hearing also of Junius his misfortune, gave over all confidence in the sea, revoluing nevertheless with all their strength and Counell to proffece the Warre by land. They thought good to continue the Siege of Lilybaenus, appointing certain men to take care of conveying neccesary accomodations in good fafon, to the Army there. Though the Carthaginians were Malers at sea, yet were encouraged, in that at land they were superiour, and that almost all Sicily was either under their power, or in League with them: But they were not pleas'd with their Confuls this year, neither did they think that things would succeed prosperously under the Confuls command, because they had profaned the Rites of Religion; for 'tis said that L. Junius did likewise set fafe neglacing the Indication of the Birds. They fled therefore to a new and unuual Refuge, and created a Dictator to go into Sicily; whereas, before this time, never any one so impoverished, had led an Army out of Italy. The Infolence of P. Clodius the Consul was then very notable, and altogether incredible: For being commanded by the Senate to nominate a Dictator, he named M. Claudius Glaucus, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Servants; as if he had not sufficiently offended his Country, by what Loffes he had brought upon it, unless he had likewise abused the Majesty of the Empire with such a Goofe. Whereupon the whole Senate being justly incensed against him, he was forced to resign up his Office, and was referred to the Council of the People. What Authors Cicero had read, report he was condemned, but others have observed, that when he Question was to be made but that the People would condamne him, he escaped by a sudden chance, a Store then arising which disposed the Assembly. And it being hereby that the Gods interposed themselves, they thought not fit to ordain any other meeting for the purpose. But Glaucus being forced to disclaim his Office, in that the City was anamed to see a man of mean ranke to be in Supreme Dignity, was nevertheless admitted to all spectacles after this time in a Noble Man's Robes. In his room A. Atilius A.F. C. N. Calatius was nominated Dictator, who made L. Caecilius L. F. C. N. Metellus, Master of the Horse, he who had Triumphed over the Carthaginians. These two went indeed into Sicily, but performed no very memorable action there.

In the mean time L. Junius, much troubled at his crost fortune, and desirous to wipe away the blot of his misrake, by some noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of some within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promises. Eryx is the highest Hill in Sicily except Assis, Situate between Panormus and Drepanum, in that part of the Island which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy towards Drepanum. In the top thereof is a Plain whereon standeth the Temple of Venus, therefore called Erycina, the richest in all Sicily, just under the Top of the Mount, in the middle of the Assent is a City of the same name, very hard to be approached unto, the way to which with much difficulty is overcome by long and narrow Passages from the Foot of the Hill. L. Junius therefore well understanding the nature of the place, appointeth a strong guard both upon the Ridge of the Mountain, and likewise in the narrow Passages below, being very safe himselfe, and having the advantage with much ease to repulse the Enemy. He also encompassed Eryx with a wall, and strengthened it with a Garrison of eight hundred Men. But Carthala landing his men there in the night time, formed that Caffle, and took and killed part of the Garrison Soulliers, others escaped to Eryx.

The other passages concerning L. Junius are very doubtfully reported by Historians, some af- form he was taken by Carthala at Agrigennas: Others, that he killed himselfe fearing to be condemned for the Loss of his Navy. There is no least uncertainty whether the Secular Wars were celebrated this year, or fourteen years after, when P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus were Confells. I think it more probable they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived from their late overthrowes, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitful year, inasmuch as twelve pound of oil was sold for an Assis. In the mean time the Dictatorship being expired, or Atilius having resigned it up, C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Cotta, and P. Scrofus L. F. C. N. Gemini were chosen Confells. The Confells were prettie successfull in Sicily, yet obtained no great Victory, nor reaped any great profit for the Common-wealth. They kept in the Carthaginians of Lilybeum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excursions, nor so often as they had done, and took their Carthals which were remote from the Sea. Carthala having made many attempts against them in vain, resolved at length to waite the Italian Coals, that thereby he might divert the Carthals from Sicily, or if they refused to come back to succour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his designs. For the Ptolemes being fent out with the City-forces for defence of the Country, compelled him to return to Sicily without effecting his purpose.

Where when the Mercenaries mutinyed for want of Pay, he exposted many of them in barren Hands, and sent others to receive their Punishment at Carthage. The Reil being incensed hereby, began manifieflly to revolt, lo that a new warre was feared from them: But Hamilcar who succeeded Carthala, coming in seafon, set upon them in the night time, flew some, and drowned others; the remainder submitting themselves, and begging pardon he received into Grace. This is that Hamilcar signed Barcar, one of the best Commanders Carthage ever bred, and indeed without compare, but that Hannibal was his Son. From this time the Warre began to be more difficult on the Romans side; For having suddenly appeased the Mercenarys, he failed to Italy, and in very great compass spoile the Locrine and Brusan Territories.

But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracuse very conftant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendship and Society with him. In the interim Hamilcar being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very strong, it called Epeirellis, an Hill craggy and full of cliffs on all sides, exalting it fell from the circumjacent Region to a very great height; the top of it is not sharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable soil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from sea, and void of all harmful and venomous creatures. Therein is a certain Hilllock which suppieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for those that fail from Drepanum and Lilybsam to Italy, with stores of fresh water. There are three ways of ascending this Mount, two from the Land, one from the Sea; but all very difficult and full of obstructions. Here did Hamilcar plant his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midst of his enemies: But trusting in the strength of the place and his own courage and skill in Marshall affairs, he found the Romans work enough, and very well fetled the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to succed well at home also. For another Carthaginian General, Hammo, who had a great emulation of Hamilcar's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealths out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Libya about Hecatopempolis, and having obtained the City, sent three thousand Hostages to Carthag; yet they had some alay of this their prosperity. For L. Cæcilius L. F. C. N. Metellus being the second time Consul, and Num. Fabius M. F. M. N. Buteo being his Colleague, a Navy was built at the charge of private men, which waited the Coast of Africa. For though the Senate had again resolved against sending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens request they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they should safely relieve those ships which were built at the publick Charge, referring the prey to themselves; so that a Fleet was sent out very considerable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coasts of Africa and assaulting Kings: Hippo, none of the meanest Cities, they fired the ships of Hippo and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counsel they devise'd a way to explicate themselves out of present danger, for failing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and so the Fore-Deck being lightened easily wafted over the Chain; then suddenly running to the Fore-Decks and depriving them, the Stern likewise slid over, and they had free liberty of falling, having delivered themselves from imminent danger. After this escape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed against them. The Roman Consuls divided their forces, L. Metellus beleiged Lilybsam, and Num. Fabius, Drepanum. Not far from Drepanum, toward the South, lyeth an Island, or rather a Rock, which the Grecians call Pelopis, we Columbaria, which the Consul stormed in the night time, and flew the Carthaginian Garrition there. Hamilcar, who came to defend Drepanum, made no delay, but at break of day set forth to recover the place again, which the Consul oberving, being not able to relieve his own men, with his whole Strength assaulted Drepanum, whereby drawing Hamilcar from his design, he kept the Island in possession, and afterward made much advantage of it in besieging Drepanum, for he damm'd up the dry sea, and joined it to the Continent; and because the Walls of the City were weakest on that side, he there began his assaults. But the encounters between Hamilcar, and these, and the Consuls of the following years, Polybius thinks impossible to be described because they were so many, and judgeth it unfit to give an occasion of the like. For Hamilcar, having his Camp at Epiriste for almost three years together, had almost daily encounters with the Romans, especially when their Camp being before Panormus was scarce five furlongs distant from the enemy. For neither did they refrain from skirmishing, having their Armies so near. Neither did they ever come to the trial of a main battell having many hindrances, especially because their forces being equal and their Camps alike strong, they were likewise on each fide protected by the vicinity of their Camp, to which the party worsted might quickly retire. Hence it came to pass that as in fight some were always slain, so when the battell declined they had a safe refuge to their Works. But while Drepanum was beleiged, the Carthaginian Fleet infell'd not only the Sicilian but the Italian shores; and Hamilcar plundering as far as he could, wafted the Italian territories even to Eumus. Many of the Romans Citizens being fallen into the Carthaginians power by these incursions, and the Sicilian fights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange of Prisoners, which party received any overplus back, was to give two pound and an half of silver for an head, and the Carthaginians receiving more then the Romans paid down the mone according.

I find two Colonies planted in Italy this year, one at Aesillus the other at Alisium. There was likewise a Lustration made at Rome (being the eight and thirtieth) by A. Stilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus, and A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Attius being Centors; and there were rated two hundred fifty one thousand, two hundred twenty two, whereas in the former Lustration there were found little less then three hundred thousand; so great a number of Citizens were confum'd by War and Shipwrecks. Nevertheless the Sicilian army was duly recruit'd, the supply being led by the Consuls M. Obruvus C. F. C. M. N. Carfus (the second time Consul) and M. Babius C. F. M. N. Licinius. Thence had a very busy and difficult warfare, but not being able to displace Hamilcar of his strong holds, they performed nothing memorable. Which happened likewise to the succeeding Consuls for the same reason, as likewise because new Generals Zonar, (being on the sudden every year elected against an old experienced Commander) spent more time in making their preparations, chusing their ground, and intimating themselves with the foul diary, then was left for the management of Affairs. It was therefore this year concluded (when the time of assembling the people drew nigh) rather to chuse a Dictator then to recall either of the Consuls out of Sicily. Ti. Cornelius Ti. F. Ti. Nepos was chosen to summon the Assembly; he nominated for Master of the Horse M. Fulvius Q. F. M. N. Flaccus. In the mean time the two Tribunes of the people, C. Fundanius and Ti. Sempronius appointed a day for Claudia, the daughter of Appius Caecus to plead her cause before the people, being accused, that returning from a Play, and her Chariot having no eafe paffage through the crowd of people, she let fall a wicked speech, Oh! that my brother were alive again and bad Command of the Fleet.

There was hardly any Noble Family in Rome but had had some relation to the Claudians, either by Cognition or Affinity, fo that she wanted not Patrons to defend her, declaring, The Nobility of her house, the merit of Appius her father, the frailty of her sex, that it was a thing unheard of for a woman to be called into Judgement: Neither was now the cause so great why a new custome should be begun against Claudia, which had not by any plot or practice offended the Majesty of the people, but only in a few words. On the contrary, the Tribunes alledged, That an impos'd and execrable speech the hath vented, ye are not ignorant, O Romans, neither is there any need of Witnefs, the her self confessing it; neither indeed can the devil itself would, because she spoke openly and in publick, not reverencing either the Gods or the multitude of Citizens round about her. When therefore the crime is manifest, why should we doubt of the punishment? Have not the Laws made sufficient Provision? Or while we read the Letter of the Law, shall we suffer our minds to be deluded in the Sense of it, 'Tis objected, That it is usual thus to accuse a woman; if it be so, why is it unusual likewise for a woman thus to offend? Neither licthero to did our Commonwealth ever afford so wicked and impudent a woman. And we wish that there were now no need of making a new Precedent, being defirous that (Offences being avoided) the Law might lie hidden and quiet, rather then be made use of against the guilty with a profitable severity. But a City that intends its own establishment, most of necessity observe the Laws, which they of all men ought least to pervert who would be esteemed the Princes and Pillars of the Commonwealth, who being skillfull in the Laws cannot be ignorant, that though in most of them there be no mention expressly made of women yet in these words, If any One, and the like, both fexes are equally comprehended. What wonder is it then if we believe the Law against Tresfon to concern both fexes, seeing this very Cia-dius is an example that both fexes may offend against it? But they Extemate the buttinelle, and have the crime feem small, because it was only in Words. What? this yet was wanting; she did not joy her endeavours, confusions and actions with the Carthaginians.
the did not raise Troops, arms Slaves, feize on the Capitol, nor aliſſy with her hands effect that wickednes against the City which in words was exprefly declar'd. Notwithstanding this the Laws provide not only for the punishment of Deeds but of ill Counsels and deſignes also; if indeed a man do an infant do hurt to any, the Law layeth no hold on their actions; yet the mind and intentions of others in many causes is made as menacing by Words as by Deeds. She who made so detestable a wish, what would she have done if it had lain in her power to have brought it to pass? Unless we deprive the Judgment of other men (which we have no reaſon to do) we shall find that in other places wicked wishes are accounted Crimes. At Athens, which for reputation of Wildom excedeth all Cities of Grece, there was a man whole office was to provide necessary accommodations for Funerals, condemned, because he wished he might make great gains, which could not be unles a great number of Citizens died: Yet those words might admit of a more favourable Interpretation. But Claudia plainly, and without any ambiguity wished Deftruction to the Citizens, Overthrow to the whole Army, and Calamity to the whole Commonwealth. Would my Brother were alive again! A naughty wish it is, if the had made it only for her brothers sake, for why should life be restor'd to him by whose means so many Citizens loft their lives? who no lefe affront'd the Commonwealth by his Arrogancy, then he did afflict it by his Raffhens? who being by the votes of all men precondemned, avoided not the infamy of his judgment, but by accident escaped the punishment?
Would you, if you were wife, have this man to live again, whole memory if you could hide in the fame Grave with his ashes, it were your duty to do it? For as other Matrons do not vainly glory of the Egregious virtues and merks of their Brethren, so would he be a shame to you if any shame or modesty be left in you. But let a Noble Lady be pardoned, though perhaps fo deftirably the hath defir'd her brothers company, if she did it out of any pious and charitable consideration. Yea, clearly abolve her, if the cause of her with be not more abominable then the wish it self foolish and inoffent. For why did you with your brother alive again?
that you might be comforted with the countenance of a near Kinman, that his labours might redound to your profit, his Authority be a protection to you, and his Honour a grace? None of all thefe. And what then? Even that he might command the Navy again! This, this wicked wretch, was the reafon why you defired, as much as in you lay, to raife the Dei, to reduce Nature to its former habi, and unlock the Clofiers of the Grave that you might find a man by whom we might be destroyed! This is the Woman, Romans, whose impudence is crave by those who while they approve themselves good Kinmen, regard not though they are esteemed ill Citizens. And truly no man is againft it, that (according to their defire) ye should have ' mercy'

mercy on her, had she had any mercy toward you. But seeing the hand withid the death of some the grief of others, that they should be childless and fatherless, say, the general calmity of all: who will be so foolishly tender as to judge her hostile, cruel, inhumane foul worthy of any mercy? What great lamentations and complaints were made when the Cen-fors upon the last Lustration gave in the number of the Citizens? Though many things these years last past succeeded prosperously, yet good men thought the Commonwealth in no very safe or good condition by reason the number of the Citizens was so much decreated. But this nothing nothing moved at the los of those who perished, therefore only griefeth because any, are remaining. She complaineth of the two great crowd in the City, she witheth him alive by whose fault chiefly the number of Citizens is so small. But it may be said, The woman her self being indeed unworthy your mercy, will ye not yet pardon her crime for her Ancestor's, for her Father's sake? Shall we then establish such a Law in our City, That if any man by any means do good to the Commonwealth his posterity shall have the liberty to offend it without punishment? Truly our Fathers were not of this opinion, when they precipitated M. Manlius from the Rock, whereas the Capitol, the Romans last hope and refuge was, not by his Father or Grand-father or any of his Progenitors, but by himself defended from the Gauls. For saving or affilting the Commonwealth there ought no other reward to be required but the confidence of the list: But Appius, if ever he did good to the Commonwealth received abundant reward, being much enriched and full of honour, in which state he continued flourishing even to his last old age. Though perhaps it were fitter not to make any mention of Appius and the former Claudius, then to put you in mind of those injuries, very high and bold ones, which that Family (from its first Original never well affected to the people) committed against you. For what Appius is it they would have you remember, but him who always with an enemies mind, crosting your delipens, chose rather to perish with his Army then be faved by his Colleague, being a Plebeian? who against the will of all the Degrees and Tribes perfitled in his Censorship beyond his due time? And now let them reckon up the merits of the Claudian Family, even from the time of the Decemviri, or from the first Original thereof, they shall find matter whereby to prove this woman like her Ancestors in pride and contumacy, rather then to make it appear she ought to be pardoned for their fakes.
What caufe therefore have these, or can any other man allege why this woman ought to go unpunished, unleis it be feared the City should looke a woman of so good example? of which opinion if ye also are, O Romans, keep, keep Claudius amongst you, that when our Ma-trans kneel at the feet of the Gods, supplicating them for the Commonwealth in time of trouble, the may hinder their devout Prayers with your Curses; that while they with for Salvation for our Armyes, the may with Delegation, while they desire to see the soldiers return safe and sound, the may desire to hear they are vanquished, exalted and flain, that while they solicit the Gods that few or none may fall in Battle, the may repine and weep, Providence if any return home. Keep the woman, that as other Martrons provoke and encourage their children and kindin, in emulation of Illustrious men, to Virtue, Courage and Love of their Country, the may infruct her by the example of P. Claudius to fight rashly, to run basely, wickedly to destroy the Citizens and arrogantly to have the Commonwealth in itself in contempt. Let her propound these things unto young Nobles to be resolved upon from their Infancy, to be practiised in their Youth; so let those men be educated to whom you must hereafter commit the charge of your Navies and Armies.

Such speeches being frequently vented Pro and Con, the People assemblin in judgement, condemned her, in a fine of five and twenty thousand pound of heavy brays. With this and other fires, T. Sempronius the Edile built and dedicated the Temple of Liberty. After this M.
Fabius M. F. M. N. Benevo and C. Atius A. F. A. N. Bulbus were made Conuls.
There was a Colone this year planted at Fregena, a Maritime City of Errasoe, nine miles from Alsium whither one was led two years since. These Conuls fought a very great Sea battell, the issue thereof was profitable to neither Party, for the Cartaginians lost a multitude of ships and men. And a tempel becavied the Romans of their rich spoiles: In Sicilia affairs were managed with the same advice, and the same fortune as the year before; The Romans having an hard task not only by reason of the Craggineffe of the places, but of Humilar his boldness and facility in martiall stratagems, whereby he so equally oppossed the Romans, that he not onely defended what place he had posseffed, and of frequent incursions vexed the Enemies affificates both on the Sicilian and Italian Coasts; but minding other things also, did every where support the Cartaginian Power even ready to fall, being very indoluous, of a resolute minde, and of excellent judgement in taking fensible Counsells. Declarous therefore to relieve the Lillythians from fear and want, being more clofeely besieged by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main sea, as hearing their Couer to Lifythun, while which the Romans failed out to Encounter, he flipt himfelf into the Haven, with some Ships he had for that purpose placed where they could not be discovered, and so strengthened and encouraged the besieged with his presence, and abundance of provisions which he brought. While the war was in this manner continued in Sicilia, A. Manlius, T. F. T. N. Torquatus Attius and
C. Sempronius T. F. T. N. Baretus being againe Conuls, came and tooke charge of the Army.
About this time the manner of their war was changed, not so much as ordered more clofeely and in
F. E. C. 1. 2.
The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountain, another below at the Foot of the Hill. The natural strength and situation of the place, with the help of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from fear of any surprize. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilcar, making anything possible, which he lifted to undertake, in a very short time reduced it into his Power. For he, in the night time, setting forward with his forces, and without noise attending thirty furlongs up the Hill, himself marching in the head of the party, surprized the Romans unawares, and having flame greatest part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest to Drepasum. From this time the face of things was very strange, and the warfare very hard and severe; for Hamilcar being now in the midst of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself besieged by them below while he besieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible pynes and danger, did for almost two years next succeeding performe the office of most Valiant soldiers. For the Camps being so near there passed not a day, may scarce an hour without alarms and skirmishes, neither party all this while Maintained or yielded, neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but still they continued equal and unvanquished, designeing in the mean time to prosecte the Warre at Sea also.

This year a Colonie was planted at Brandusium, in the Salentinas Territories, twenty years after that Country was subdued by the Romans. About this time T. Cornelianus, who was the first High Priest of the Plebeians, died in a great old age, and in his place succeeded L. Cæcius Metellus. The next Confuils were C. Fundanius C. F. L. N. Fundanius, and C. Sulpius C. F. S. N. Gallus. By them the war with Hamilcar was managed in the same manner, and with the same fortune as before, only the Mercenary Gauls, and others who kept Garrison in Eryx, being discontented for want of Pay, and other injuries, endeavoured to betray the City to the Romans, but not being able to effect it, they revolted to the Confuils, and thefe were the first Foreigners the Romans ever entertained into feacity of Armes. Notwithstanding this access of strength, they were not able by their Land-forces to finish the War, chiefly by reason of Hamilcar's virtue, who could neither be circumvent by craft, nor vanquished by Force.

Once more therefore they consulted about letting forth another Navy to Sea; For by no other means could the Carthaginians be kept from Sicily, unless they were maffetered by Sea. And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former successes, when the Navy was let forth at the cost of private men; But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continual War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit readily believe the wants of the Common-wealth, so generous were the Senators, that in a time of publick danger they forsook to spare their private purses, out of which in the sudden more money was raised then the building of a Navy required. Those who were richest did every man undertake to build a Coas-gunter, letting it forth compleatly manned and armed; others according to their estates joined two or three together in the same design, upon this condition, that when the Commonwealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this means two hundred ships of five Oares on a side were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hannibal Rhaetius. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their late refuge, they revolved with this Navy of Necellity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these things were in doing, C. Lucatius C. F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Pofhumes A. F. L. A. Albinius elected the Consulship. A. Pofhumes was then Priest of Ceres, and therefore when he desired to call lots for his Province, L. Metellus the High Priest would not suffer him, pronouncing it unlawfull for a Priest to depart from the place of his Office, and leave the Ceremonies unperformed, which was likewise allowed of, and agreed upon by succeeding Generations. The Senate likewise at the same time shewd a like Example of defending their Country's Religion, for they forbod C. Lucatius the Consul to ask counsell at Preneste, and manage the Affairs of the Common-wealth by direction of outlandish Auguries. Then intending their minds upon the War (because both the Confuils could not be spared with safety of their Religion, and one seemed not sufficient to bear the whole burthen) they ordained one of the Pretors (being this the first year wherein they began to create two) to accompany C. Lucatius, and it fell to the Lot of Q. Valerius Patro. These gathering together all the Publick and private ships to the number of three hundred, with Ferry-boats, and other Vessells to the number of seven hundred, as soon as Winter was over, sailed to Sicily, whither being come, they find both the Libyanes and Drepasum Havens open for them. For the Enemy not expecting any Navy from Italy, were returned to Africa with all their ships. The Consul Animated with this prosperous beginning, being by nature full of spirit, hating Idleness, and decrious of Action, beloved Drepasum, raising Works against it; in the mean time not omitting to train up his Sea-soldiers, daily exercizing them (as foreseeing sudden use of them in fight) intolomuch as they were utterly ignorant of Maritime Affairs and chances, seemed sufficiently prepared for any Encounter.

The City of Drepasum being fiercely assaulted both by Sea and land, and now reduced even to the utmost danger, part of their Wall being battered to the ground; it chanced that the

In place of Livie's Nineteenth Book.

Conful Valiantly fighting in the head of his men, received a deep wound in his thigh; whereupon his Souldiers troubled at his fall, and running in to him, missed the opportunity of taking the place, when it was even a chief in their hands: Before the Conful had recovered the use of his foot, news was brought of a great Carthaginian Navy approaching, to the number of four hundred ships, stored with provision for their Army, with a very great strength of foouldiers, and abundance of Arms and Money,

Hanno, a Carthaginian Noble Man, was Commander in Chief, his chief care was to get safe to Eryx, ease his ships of their burden, and so manning them with few Souldiers from Hamilcar, to return and fight the Roman Navy. His design was well contrived, but prevented by the wisdom and circumspection of C. Lutatius the Conful, who knew it would be of great moment to the Victory, to encounter the Carthaginians while their ships were heavy laden, and conienced with the burden of their own provisions. Therefore upon the Ides of March, filling his ships with choice foouldiers, he saileth to the hands Eages, over against Lilybœum, where he discovereth Hanno coming from Hiero ones; then encouraging his Sea-men and foouldiers he appointeth next day for the fight: But at break of day he began, because the wind was arisen favourable to the Carthaginians, and contrary to himselfe. Weighing then the Reasons on both sides, he thought it fitter to fight with the winds, and Hanno while he was alone, and had his ships laden, then suffer him to pass by to unlade his ships, and bring back into battell the flower of their foot Army, and also Hamilcar himelfe, who at that time was very formidable. Observing therefore the Enemies ships they passed by with full fafe, he fetteeth forth out of the Haven, and to encourage his men, caufeth himelfe to be carried into the Admirall Gally, having not recovered the use of his limbs: Signe of battell being given on both sides, C. Faberius performed the Office of General, by reason of C. Lutatius his infirmity, not sufficient to supply the place. The fight lasted not long before it plainly appeareth on which fide the Victory inclined; for the Roman ships being light and nimble, did on every fide, at their pleasuresuffle the Carthaginians, being heavy, and almost immoveable; they were likewise in every thing else supeorous, being taught by experience to avoid and amend whatsoever heretofore they had found inconvenient, and harmefull: Their ships were built after the best fashions, they had carefully laid aside all lumber which was of no use in fight, their Rowers were lucy, and well trained up, and they had a very confiderable strength of Legionaries; All these were very great advantages towards the Victory. On the other fide, the Carthaginian ships were heavy with burden, their Rowers newly leaved, and their men negligent, as being in security; for they had hoped the Romans would no more have tried their fortune at Sea. Therefore, as it muft needs be, where the difference is fo great, the Victory was not long in obtaining, the Carthaginians loft an hundred and twenty ships, seventy whereof were taken, with all the men, to the number of ten thoufand, the rest upon an happie change of winds in the time of fight, escaped to Hiero ones. This was that famous battell at the hands Eages, as it is chiefly described by Polybios.

For other writers affirm, that feventy three ships were taken, an hundred and twenty five funke, and twenty and thirty thoufand men taken prisoners, and thirteenth thoufand plain, the prizes taken were very great, not only in Provisions and Armes, but in gold and silver also. Of the Roman Navy twelve ships were loft. This reported that from the beginning of the fight a fiery meteor was seen in the aere, threatening as it were the Carthaginian Navy with it's point directed against it, prefignifying the event which presently ensued. Hanno, with the rest of the ships which escaped out of the Fight, except those which fled to Lilybœum, returning to Carthage, was putt to death for this his Misfortune. C. Lutatius the Conful went to the Army before Lilybœum, where, while his wound was in cure, he spent his time in taking an account of the ships, and Captives, and ordering how their state should be disposed. Thence he went to Eryx, where he fought Hamilcar with good success, having taken two thoufand Carthaginians. The Carthaginians at home understanding what a great Overthrow they had received, though their spirits were great, yet found that they wanted strength and means, to renew and carry on the War. For they were not able, fo long as the Romans were Masters at sea, to supply their Army at Eryx with neceffary accommodations; and, if that Army miscarried, they knew not where to raise any more foouldiers, or find a Generall they durft confide in. Being by this Neceffity driven into despair, they sent to Hamilcar, empowering him with full Commission to do what he himselfe should think fit or convenient for the Republicke: He having hither performed the Office of an excellent Generall, did now no lefs behave himselfe as a good Citizen: For having duly and seriously considered all arguments on both fides, when he found there was no other means but Peace, whereby to preserve the Common-wealth; he sent Emblems to the Conful to treat with him thereabout. The mention of Peace was not well-received to the Conful, for being now shortly to lay down his Office, he could not by any means hope for the obtaining of a greater Glory, then that, of having finifhed the War, and to tranfmit that to his succesflour which was in his own power to accomplish, and most properly belonged to him, he thought both unfeafonable and unprovided: He was the more forward, as being very well conscious of the wants of the Common-wealth, and that he thought it fit his Country, after so many yeares continuall labour, toould enjoy some reft. Wherefore after a long dispute of Articles on both fides, it was agreed, that the Carthaginians should totally depart Sicily, that they should not wage war against Hiero, and the Syracusians; or any of their Appius, &c. that they should forthwith without ransom restore all Captives, and deliver up all Runagades, that they should in the space of twenty years, by equal portions, pay two thousand two hundred Euboean Talents of pure silver: That the confederates of each party might live free and unmolested, That neither party should exercise any command, or make any political building, or raise any fortifications within the others jurisdiction, nor admit the others associates into friendship and confederacy. 'Twas added, that these Articles were firmly concluded, if the people of Rome would agree therewith.

But it could by no means be obtained (though the Consul earnestly insisted upon it,) that the fouldiers within Eryx should resign up their Armes; Hamilcar protesting, That he would rather sacrifice himself and his country to destruction, than yield to such a disgrace: Nevertheless he was confederate, That every man at his departure thence should pay eighteen pence.
Hereupon messengers were sent both by the Consul and the Carthaginians to inform the Senate and People of the Conditions agreed upon. The people did not allow of the peace, but sent ten Delegates to take an exact account of all circumstances, who being returned, they heightened the Conditions, That the Carthaginians should presently lay down a thousand Talents, and within ten years after pay two thousand two hundred, that they should clearly quit not only Sicily, but all other Islands between the and Italy, that they should not fall in a long ship either into Italy or any of the Romans Islands, nor hire any fouldier from them.

The Carthaginians, fo they might have peace, refused nothing; Hamilcar, before the Articles were livered unto, laid down his Command and went to Libycaem, and from thence to Carthage, having approved himself, without comparison, the most excellent of all their Generals in that War, both in Courage and in Counsel. After this manner was managed and finished the first Carthaginian War, which lasted for four and twenty years with various chances and great losses, but to the greater damage of them who at last proved Victors.
For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian ships to have been lost, and seven hundred of the Romans, which is a great argument of the Romans Constancy and Resolution, that, not regarding so many losses by fight, or shipwacks folliated, they did yet with patience bear and overcome the power of their Enemy, the Frowns of Fortune, the tedious labour and pain, and the poverty of their Treasury.

After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Consul was prorogued, that he might nacht little affairs in Sicily; thither likewise was sent his brother one of the new Consuls, Q. Lutatius C.P. C.N. Cereis, whose Colleague was A. Manlius T.P. N. These did, by their wisdom order the Province, and fecled all things in peace and quiet, deciding all controversies and taking away all causes of quarrels and tumults, which after to great motions and alterations were unavoidably remaining. They disarmed all the Sicilians who adhered to Hamilcar, as likewise the Gauls who had revolted from him; furthermore the Gauls were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire, because, besides other offences, when they were in the Garrition on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their several abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Cutilum; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was sent to command and govern yearly.

In the mean time Embassadors came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all reforted without ransom, as many as were in Publick custody; they who were prisoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treasury. But unlucky accidents at home did much diminish the joy of the Roman people. The River Tibur did this year flow higher then ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the first force thereof was bathed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted ( for the Inundation continued many days) after the fall of the water, did much decay.

After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which suddenly beginning in the night time, and running through many streets of the City, destroyed an incredible multitude of houses and men; and, not content with private harms, consumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. At length it leaped upon the Temple of Vesta; but then L.
Caiusius the Chief Priest, seeing the Holy things and secret Pledges of the Roman Empire to be in danger, behaved himself worthy of his Office, for he leaped into the midst of the fire without any care of himself, so he might but relieve the Holy things which the Virgins had forlaken and left behind them, which accordingly he performed. Himself having his Arme half burnt and his Eye sight spoile, beside the comfort he received from his good ad, was eminentely rewarded by the people of Rome, who Decreed, That as often as he went to the Senate he should be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never grant-ted to any man before.

In the mean time O. Lutatius the Consul, with his brother Catius and O. Valerius the Proprietor, having settled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them them their Triumph; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and Q. Trium. Caesar Valerius on the day before the Nones of the same month. There was a memorable strife between these two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without dispute agreed upon, Q. Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory declared the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catulus on the other side alleged, That the latter authority should not be equalized with the greater in the honours.

The question being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to stand to arbitration, Whether or not the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduct? Catulus refused not to answer him; whereupon C. Asinius Calatinus was chosen Arbitrator, who asked Valerius, Whether the Consul’s authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in case they had differenced in their consultation about fighting? and in case their Auguries had been different whether of the two ought to have been followed? To which when Valerius answered, That in both cases the Consul’s authority ought to have prevailed above the Pretor’s; Calatinus not expecting till Catulus spake, passed sentence on his side. But Q. Valerini, though he was call by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Fabius Butes being Cenfors, made the nine Triumvirs and thirtieth Lustration. There were numbered two hundred and three thousand Citizen Tribes, two Tribes being superadded, the one called Velina the other Quirina, the number of Tribes was made up five and twenty, and so continued. Sicily being now wholly subdued, as much as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things seemed not only quiet but very safe and secure; when behold a sudden war, arising from whence it was least feared, did for a few days discomfit all Italy both with the terror and fear of an Intelline broil, as likewise with wonder at the speedy dispatch and issue of it.

The Faliscii, I know not upon what account, grew so mad as to rise up in arms against the Romans; but the Consul being lent with the Legions quelled them within six days, and reduced them to subjection. In the former battle, for ’tis reported two were fought, the Victory was doubtful, for their foot prevailed though their horse were routed. But in the latter the victory being on the Romans side complete, caused the Faliscii to humble themselves and beg peace, having lost fifteen thousand men: upon their yielding they were fined with the loss of their arms, horse, household-stuff, servants and half their Territories. Their City in whose strength they confided was translated from a craggy difficult place into plain open ground. The people of Rome were meditating a more severe revenge, out of anger against a City which had so often rebelled, but restraining their wrath by the advice of Pappus (who had written the form of submission by the Consul’s own command) That the Faliscii submitted not to the Power but the Faith of the Roman: And so much did the sacred name of Publick Faith prevail with them all, that they adjudged the conquered party no severer punishment then was agreed upon. This war gave occasion to have this year ended with the Triumphs of the Consuls; Q. Lutatius Triumphed on the Calends of March over the Faliscii, A. Manlius the fourth of the Nones of March.
BOOK X.

Tally being now once more at Peace within it selfe, their Publick Pleasures, and Delights did likewise encreafe with their Power and Security. When the Roman Games were exhibited, C. Claudius A. P. F. C. N. Cenzus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tindanus being Confuls, L. Livius Andronicus, in imitation of the Gracian Comedies and Tragedies, reduced the Stage Plays, which heretofore were only Satyrs into Fables, and feigned representations. The fame year likewise gave beginning to another sort of sports On the fourth of the Calends of May, the Floralia were instituted out of the Nysia books, to aver the blatifing of fruits and plants then springing forth. L and M. Publicius Malleolus, Brothers and Aediles of the People did exhibit publick shews out of the Finis raised from Herdesmen who had fed their Cattel on Commons. The Magistracy of thefe Brethren was in another respect very memorable, in that they caufed that Cliff (which from them received the name of Publicus) to be made plain and even, for the more commodious passage of Carriages into Mount Avenins, whereas before the Rock in that place was craggie and almost impassable. They likewise built the Temple of Flora in the great Shew-Place.

These things were acted at home, while all things were quiet abroad, onely there was a sufficion that the Gauls and Ligurians had a designe for War. That these Provinces therefore were alligned to the Confulls, and war then commenced with the Gauls, is rather a Conjefture, than a true History, there being no antient writer extant which accurately describes those things; This one thing is certain, that a Latine Colonie was planted at Spoletium in Umbria. The next year also 'tis easier to say, there was no Peace because the Temple of Janus was not shut, but to declare where or with what success the war was managed. And the Confulship of Q. Mamilius Q. F. Q. N. and Q. Valerius Q. F. P. N. is hardly known by any other passage then that Ennius the firstspat Elegant Roman Poet was that year borne. But the year after, when Ti. Sempronius Ti. F. C. N. Gracchus and P. Valerius; Q. F. P. N. Falto were Confuls, the Gallick wars brake out again, and the Ligurians a new Enemy, were then first invaded by a Roman Army. This Province fell to the lot of T. Sempronius. P. Valerius encountered the Gauls, at the first with ill succes, having loft three thousand five hundred men: But, entering the fight again he obtained a signall Victory, wherein fourteen thousand Gauls were slain, and two thousand taken. But, by reason of the lossthulden in the former battle, the Conful was denied the Honor of Triumph, especially seeing his prodigious fight was rather to be attributed to the Fortune of the Common-wealth, then to his wise management of the buftnes. For after the first fight, understanding that alliancè was coming to him from Rome, he said, he had rather perish with all his Army, then obtain Victory by the help of others; and in this fury he cast himselfe and the Roman Army into the hazard of a battell. T. Gracchus had better and more happy success, for having overthrown the Enemy in a set battell, he depopulated great part of Liguria. From thence he crossed over into Sardinia and Corsica, and bringing back a vast multitude of Captives, gave occasion to that proverb of Sardi Ventaè, whereby is signified any thing that is plentiful, and at an underate to be sold.
But to confefs the truth, the Romans had at this time rather a good opportunity then a just cause of poffefling Sardinia and Corseca. The Carthaginians after the Sicilian Peace, were involved in a very troublesome war with their Mercenaries, and reduced even to the utmost extremity; whereupon other their Hirings, who were in a Garrison in Sardinia, new either the Carthaginian General with all his men: Hans being sent from Carthage to punish their Villany, they inveigled his Army into a Society of Rebellion, and apprehending him, nailed him to the Cross, and having flain all the Carthaginians, they had poffefled almost all the strong holds throughout the Island, till upon a falling out between them and the Sardinians, they were expelled the Island, and betook themselves into Italy. Then did they accomplish that which while they were in Sardinia they could not: for at that time they had invited the Romans to the Dominion of that Island: But being now present either by the importunity of their Entreatys, or by plainly demonstrating what an occasion was offer'd of encreasing the Roman Power, they prevailed with them to fall over into Sardinia. For it is a virtue of no ordinary strain, to abstain from other men's goods when they with safe poffefion, neither can covetous or ambitious men well or long dissemble their greedy desires: But 'twill not be amifs for the better understanding of this business, to relate some foregoing circumstances. The Romans, that they might gain the Reputation of Humanity, did in the beginning of this Warre, very much favour the Carthaginian cause. And, though they sent them no assistance as was desired, yet they refused to entertain the Uticans, or any others that revolted to them: They commanded their Merchants out of Sicily and Italy to accommodate the Carthaginians with all necessary Provisions, prohibiting all traffic with their Enemies, and gave licence of hiring men out of Italy for this war, They sent likewise Embassadors, though in vaile, to compote the strife: A little before there was a controversy, because the Carthaginians had taken some Italian Merchants conveying Commodities to the Enemy, and secured them in publick Prisons, and they had then five hundred of them in chains, and having slain not a few, had cast them into the sea to prevent the discovery of the thing; whereupon the Romans declared themselves aggrieved, and began to threaten War: But the Carthaginians refraining those whom they had in custody, so pacified the Romans, that they in answer sent back without ransom all other Prisoners taken in the Sicilian war. Yet at length Ambition prevailed, with a desire to crush that People, with whom they had for four and twenty years together waged war with various successes, and forebears, that unless in time they prevented it, they must be forced to fight again. Wherefore when the Carthaginians, (having against their wills lost Sardinia, and now finished their war with the Mercenaries) meditated Revenge upon the Authors of Rebellions and Revolts, the Romans laid hold of this occasion, and declared, that War should be proclaimed against Carthage, unless they laid down their Arms, which they had taken up, seemingly against their Rebels, but indeed and really against the Romans. Whereupon the Carthaginians unwilling in an unfeasible time to undertake so great a War, did not only quie Sardinia, but upon the Roman demand, added likewise twelve hundred Talents of silver, to their former fine. This injury did most of all incense the minds of the Carthaginians, and is thought to be the only cause of that war which was soon after commenced, and prosecuted by Hamilcar. For Hamilcar coniunct Hated of Romans (to which the second Parique war is chiefly imputed) was not by any other means more hotly exasperated, or fiery gomented. But these things happened afterwards.

In the main time L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Claudius, and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flectus being made Consuls had Gaul on this side the Po for their Province. That a Colonia was this year planted at Valencia, though many affirm it is no conslant and general opinion, unless there be another Valencia besides Vibes, which Authors of better credit affirm to have been peopled fifty years after in the Confulsiphip of Quintus Flaminius and Cn. Domitius Aemilus. The Consuls in Gallia, while they kept their forces united, had a safe and prosperous Expedition, but after they had divided their Legions out of sneakines to waste more places, the Camp of M Fulvius was in the night time assaulted and very hardly defended. The Gauls departing without effecting their design, did afterward return with greater terror having their forces much augmented. For the prime men of the ibli taking counsel secretly together, raised a vast power of Transalpines against the Romans. In the mean time L. Lentulus the Consul, who had marched with his Army into the Ligurian Territories, obtained there a great Victory. It was ordered therefore he should make a Triumph, which accordingly he did on the Intercalary Ides.

Some Authors report, That these Consuls were the first who led the Roman army over the Po, and that in divers fights were slain four and twenty thousands, and taken five thousand of the Ligurians and Insulabri Gauls. But I rather believe, that the Po was crost over and the Insulabri first encountered in their own Country in the next Gallick commotion. About this time Embassadors were sent to Ptolomey King of Egypt to profer him alittance in his wars against Antiochus and the Syrians. The King returned thanks, telling them withall, That he had now need of assistance inasmuch as the quarrel was compounded. After this Hiero came to Rome to the great joy of the Romans, who entertained him with all the respect as befited them to do, being a confederate Prince, having deservd much of them, and a companion in their greatest Victory. He befowied the people of Rome two hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat; he came to behold the spors which were prepared against next year.

For according to some Authors the fecular spors were celebrated in the Confulsiphip of P. Corneliini.
Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caecinus and C. Licinius P. F. P. N. The Masters of the Revelli were M. Aurelius M. F. & M. Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator. In the mean time the Boian Princes, confiding in the multitude of Auxiliaries they had from beyond the Alps, sent to the Consuls demanding, That Ariminum with its Territories, which without doubt of right belonged to the Gauls, should be restored them, otherwise a terrible and Defensive War would ensue. The Consuls, having not drawn their forces together, durst not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they content unto the Gauls their demand, they answered therefore, They should send Embassadors to the Senate, to signify their demand. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for some days, while the Embassadors could go and return again. The Embassadors at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward no use, in a much as Fortune without the expense of Roman blood put an end to it. While the Embassadors returned, the Boians fought a set Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people, had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a fulpicion arose, that their maine Errand was to poffefs that Territory themselves; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having flain their Kings Arce & Galatius as Traitours, they endeavoured by force to expel those strangers out of their Land, whereupon a Battell was fought with much slaughter, and both sides being thereby much weakened, the Transalpine returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. This war being so quickly dispatched, the Consuls went into Liguria: where P. Lentulus, having in a set Battle Overthrown the Enemy, led his Army through the whole Region, taking Ball(stage, some by force, some by composition. C. Licinius intending to sail over into Corse, not having boats enough to transport his whole Army, sent M. Claudius Glycias before, with a Party; who, being vainly arrogant, when he saw that the Coriscans were terrified at his coming, without any respect to the Consul by whose direction he was sent, or consideration of his own office and duty, made a league with them, upon certain Conditions, in his own Name; thinking thereby to attain unto himselfe the Glory of having reduced that Island. But the Consul following with the Refidue of the Army, forbore not to prosecute them with arms (notwithstanding they alleged in their own behalf the Claudian Peace) till he brought them into subjection. The Senate to clear the Commonwealth from the Imputation of Breach of Faith, ordered Glycias the Author of that dishonourable peace, to be delivered up into the hands of the Coriscans, and they refusing to take him, he was put to death in the Common Gaole. This year were Centoours L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caesarius & Lentulus C. F. C. N. Crecq, who made no Luritation because C. Crecq died in his Centourship. For all Claudius was delivered up to the Coriscans, and then executed as a Mafco-factor, yet the Barbarians could not by any means be prevailed on, that the Roman was afterward was just against them. Their minds therefore being aggrieved with the memory thereof were easily tempted to break out in arms, in imitation of their neighbour Island Sardina. For the Carthaginians by secret promises had incited the Sardiniens to Rebellion, who readily entertained the motion, as not too much hating their old Masters, not loving their new ones. This news being brought to Rome, filled the City both with fear and indignation, not that they much regarded Sardina, but because they perceived the Carthaginian war would break out again; which because they believed the sooner it was begun would prove the easier; (The Carthaginians having not well recovered themselves since the last war) they resolved to prepare themselves, and commence it as soon as might be. The Carthaginians, willing at that time to endure any thing rather then a Roman war, were hereupon so terrified, that having once and again sent Embassadors in vain, they did at length lend ten of their Prime Nobility, most humbly entreating, That they might enjoy the Peace they had obtained. Nevertheless they could not receive any mild Answere; till Hannus the youngest among the Embassadors, but of a daunted mind, and a free tongue, replied, If you are prompterly determined to deny that Peace which we have bought, not for a year or two, but for ever, at least restore our price we gave you, Sicily and Sardina: In private contracts we have no mans part, when the bargain is made void, to receive his Commodities back, and not return the money laid down for them. Then the Romans, being ashamed to feem the Authors of an unjust War, dismissed the Embassadors with a better Answere. So one of this yeares Consuls C. Asiarius A. F. A. N. Bulbus (now the second time Consul) remained in Italy, the other, T. Meurzus, T. F. T. N. went according to his lot into Sardina. He, in many places encountering the Enemy with good successes, appealed the whole Island, subdued the Sardiniens, and triumphed over them the sixth of the Ides of March.

Thefe thinges being accomplished, and the Roman Armies laid down, as having no Enemy, the Temple of Jannus was shut; an unusuall night in Rome, and not seen, after the days of Numae, for the space of about four hundred and forty years. In which respect I account the City of Rome very unhappy, that being perpetually employ'd in great and difficult labours, could never obtain the fruits thereof. For, whereas no wife man wagg'd war but to procure Peace, this City after so many and great warres happily finisht; sometimes could not obtain; but never could long keep Peace. For even then new Rumours of War, after a few moneths, were heard of
of, which bereaved them of the sweetness of that Peace, which they had scarce well tasted of. The Sardinians, who had lately been subdued, showed not the yoke, and the Corsicans broke out in Rebellion, and the Ligurians raised Tumults, even in Italy it selfe. Therefore L. Pothinus A.F. A.N. Albinius and Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. C.N. Maximus being Consuls had order to levy new Armies, which being disposed of in three bodies to prevent the enemies from helping one the other. L. Pothinus afflicted the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius the Corsicans, and P. Carvilius was design'd for Sardinia. This hand being of a very unwholesome sort afflicted his Army with the Plague and other diseases, whereby many mortals with the Pretor also himself perished. Hereupon the Sardinians grew bold and high, but were soon quelled after the arrival of Sp. Carvilius in a great feat battel; the Consuls were likewise subdued by him. For which exploit it was decreed he should Triumph, as he did on the Calends of April, in Liguria C. Capitol. Column. Zonaras.

For his like wise affairs succeeded well by the management of the other Consul with his Army. At Rome Titus one of the Vejall Virgins was condemned of Incest which she had boldly committed with a slave, flew her self with her own hands. After this C. Artius A.F. A.N. Bulo. Zonaras.

A. Pothinus A.F. L.N. Albinius being Censors, made the fortieth Lustration. This probable the number of Citizens was this year left then hereofore (though I find not the number recorded) because the Ce nor, in order to the encrease of Citizens, compelled every man to swear, That he would marry for the Procration of children. This year Cn. Nevius a Campanian who had receiv'd pay in the Carthaginian war, did first add Fables to his Scenes. In the mean time the Ligurians and Sardinians again rebelling, were allotted Provinces to the new Consul; M. Pomponius M.F. M.N. Matto the Sardinian; whereas it was reported, That the Carthaginians were the cause of this commotion, by private messengers stirring up the Barbarians to Rebellion. There were Embassadors sent to Carthage with very harfth instructions, To require the tribute due, to command them to abstain from all Islands under the Roman Jurisdiction, adding threats of war unless they performed what was required at their hands.

The Carthaginians had now since their former calamities gathered strength and courage, chiefly by the industry of Hamilcar, who did not only reduce those who had revolted in Africa, but had farther extended the Empire: They had likewise by his conduct acquired great Dominions in Spain. Wherefore they answered the Embassadors roughly enough to all particulars; but then, when they, according to their instructions, propounded to the Carthaginians a Spear and a Caduceus, offering them their choice of which they pleased, they answered, That they would choose neither, but would accept of what sooner the Legates should think fit to leave behind. Henceforward a cruel hatred began to burn between these two people, but neither party being willing yet to commence the war, they continued in a flew of friendship, rather because they did not fight, then that the peace was kept.

Both the Consuls, returning to Rome and declaring what they had done, obtained leave to Triumph. Q. Fabius had slain many Ligurians in battel, and had compelled the rest to contain themselves upon the Alpes, and made the skirts of Italy secure from their plunderings. He Triumphed over the Ligurians on the Calends of February. Upon the Ises of March afterwards M. Pomponius Triumphed over the Sardinians, whom he had overcame. Nevertheless the Sardinians did not abstain from War, but being by their looses rather incendi'd then broken, they renewed the Rebellion with much greater strength. Therefore both the Consuls, M. Amilius M.F. M.N. Lepidus and M. Publicus L.F. L.N. Multuscol were sent into Sardinia: they gathered together great store of plunder and spoil in that Island, which when they carried with them into Corsica they utterly loft, the hands there taking it from them. At home likewise there were very vehement tumults at this time, for C. Flamininus Tribune of the people propounding an Agrarian Law, That the Piceni and Gallick grounds which belonged to the Senators should be equally divided amongst the people. The Senate opposed it, and not being able to persuade the Tribune by entreaties or threats, at length gave order to the Magistrates to raise an Army for defence of the Commonwealth; Flamininus could not yet be drawn from his resolution, obstinate against all force, and inexorably by intraties. His father likewise admonish'd him, To submit himself to the will of the Senate, and not be esteemed an author of sedition. But he still perishing in his design, called an Assembly, intending to recite the Law. But then his father Flamininus in grief and anger came to the Pulpit, and taking his ban by the hand pulled him away.

A wonderful Example was there shown with what Piety and Reverence all men held esteem of the power of a Father: For he who had contemned the indignation and cruel threats of the whole Senate, now in the heat of work, in the view of all the Roman people, to whom the Constituition of Law would have been most acceptable, suffered himself by the hand of one only old man to be drawn down from the higher place. The Modesty of the Assembly in this business is not to be forgotten, who though they saw all their hopes frustrated by the Tribune's departure, did not by the least murmure signify their discontent at his fathers action. But the Law was by this means rather deferred then avoided. C. Carvilius the other Tribune affilling his Colleague, this as it caused corruption of manners amongst the Commons, so it gave beginning to that most grievous Gallick war which broke out the eighth year after the division of the grounds.
After this, M. Pompianus M. F. M. N. Maecenas, and C. Papirius C. F. L. N. Mafa, being Consuls, had for their Provinces M. Pompianus Sardinia, and C. Papirius Corsica. In both places the Enemies gave back, betraying themselves into woods and craggy Mountains, defending themselves more by the incursions of Places than by Armies. Therefore M. Pompianus seeing it more hard to find the Enemy, then to overcame him, caused hounds to be brought out of Italy, who by their scent conducted him to the men, whom he surprised like wild beasts in their dens, and kennels. C. Papirius, having overcome the Corsicans, pursued them into the mountains, where both his labour and danger was very great, and many of his fowlers perished either by thirft, or by the sudden incursions of the Enemy, till having found water and refresh'd his Army, the Corsicans fearing the Issue heartened to the Consuls counsel of submitting themselves.

While the Consuls were detained by these Employments, a General Assembly was called by M. Dullius, M. F. C. M. N. who was made Dictator for that purpose; he nominated C. Arruinus L. F. C. N. Cotta for Master of the Horse; there were likewise Centours T. Maglus T. F. N. Torquatus, Q. Fulviaus C. F. Q N. Flaccus, but being not Legitimately made, they resigned up their office. Writers due to this year assigne the Original of a new Cufome, not unworthly to be mentioned. There had been no divorce from the beginning of the City to this time, Sp. Carvius Ringa's first of all dismissed his wife because she was barren, being by the Cenfours bound in Oath, to Marry a Wife for propagation of Children. The people were much displeased not so much at the Novelty as cruelty of the things, for wives being join'd in a perpetual society of life, they thought it unjust and inhumane for any cause whatsoever to repudiate them. They likewise ever after hated Sp. Carvius though he was of necessity compell'd by the judgment of his friends to dismiss his wife who was much beloved by him, and very agreeable in her Manners. From this time there was more knots in the Law, and more suits in the Preterous Courts, then being invented the Marriage Cautions, of which cunning there was no need before Divorces were in use. This year likewise began a new custom concerning the Honours of their Generals, C. Papirius pervinghimself he had performed Actions worthy of a Triumph (having now at length firmly fetled Cefar) and being denied that honour by the Senate, he did toward the End of his Consulship make a Triumph in Mount Albion on the third of the Nones of March. It pleased many to imitate this Example when they were denied a Triumph to make one in the Alban Mount, henceforward he was present at all sports in a mistle Crown in memory of the Action, that he had overcame the Enemy in the Mistle Fields.

All things being at quiet in Sardinia and Corsica, the Ligurians still hold out, against whom were sent M. Aimitus L. F. Q N. Barbula and M. Jugius D. F. D. N. Pers, then Consulls. They, in their March understanding that the Gauls began to hirife, entred the Territories with the Army. For they being much provok'd by the Flaminian Law, the Romans feared they being Warlike, and angry men, they shou'd rise any Commotions; it was therefore forbidden by the Magistrates to accommodate any Gaule with Gold or Silver; for the Boians, and other Gauls by selling their slaves and other Commodities had gather'd a great bank of Money, and a sufpcicion was rais'd, that it was for a Roman War. Wherefore being more incendi, 'tis said that they understanding the Consulls were design'd for Liguria, did in private meetings conclude, while the Roman Armies were far abroad, to March up to and assault the City it selfe. But, being terrify'd with the coming of the Consulls, and not prepar'd to make head against them, they entertained the Romans with all shew of Peace and friendship, and counterfeit Respects. The Consulls likewise being contented they had prevented the War, fain'd another cause of their coming thither; that through the Gallick Territories they might have no more commotions march to Liguria. The last year the Cenfours renounced the Office; This year therefore Q Fabius Q F. Q N. Maximus Verresus, and M. Symonius C. F. M. N. Tuditanus made the one and Fourthie Lustration, While these things are acting in Italy and Rome, a new war was occasioned with the Illyrians upon their ground. The Illyrians exercising Pyracy, a cruel and greedy kind of theft, had taken many Italian Merchants coming out of the Haven of Brundifum and had flain some; at the firft the Senate hearing this, among other complaints, did not much regard it. But the Pirates boldness increas'd by their impunity, and complaints more frequently and earnestly made unto them, they thought fit to send Embassadors, to demand satisfaction; as also to plead the Illyrians cause who had lately committ'd themselves to the faith of the Romans, for they inhabiting an Island in the Sconian seas, were daily protecu'd with all manner of injuries by the Illyrians, from whom they had revol'ted. C. & L. Cornuncius were sent on this Errand: While they were in their journey, Agren (the son of Plocratus) King of the Illyrians, called Ardesi, to whom their message was direct'd, departed this life leaving a fon under age, by name Pindus, and the Kingdom was governed by Teuta, Step-mother to the young Prince, with the advice of her friends: she being proud, and puff'd up with Prosperity, having given Audience to the Roman Embassadors with some contempt, answer'd, That she would take care that the Romans should receive no public injury from the Illyrians; but that it was not the custom of the Illyrian Kings, to prohibit private persons from making what gain they could by sea. Cornuncius the younger could not refrain his anger at this arrogant speech but using an unpleasing liberty, though not unjust, replied, But 'tis a custom with the Romans, Teuta, to profess private wrongs with publl lick vengeance, and relieve the injured party; and we will endeavour by the assistance of the gods, to compel you gladly and quickly to mind and reform your Kingly Customs. The woman was a bove measure offended at these words, but, for the present, dissembling her mind, when the Em-bassadors were departed, sent some Pirates after them, who flew Coruncanim the younger with a part of his Retinue, burnt the Governors of ships with fire, and clapt the rest in chains. Co-temporously also the Embassador of the Iffrans was slain by the same Pirates.

The Romans undertaking these things, did erect statues of three foot long in honour of Coruncanim the younger, and P. Junius, and decreed war against Teuta and the Illyrians. Teu-ta, ignorant in government, having not learnt either by Reason or Cultume to correct the Vices of her Femenine wit, behaved herself as timorous in bearing the anger of others, as she had been headlong in provoking it. Having therefore intelligence that a war was preparing against her, she promised, to restore those who were living, as for the dead, whom the Pirate had slain without her command, to lay not in her power to restore them. This Embassage (though it offered little satisfaction for so great injuries, yet because the Romans hoped to compose the Illy-rian broils without a war) was entertained, only they required, That those who flew the Em-bassadors should be delivered up to them.

The woman seeing the war, she so much feared, to be deferred, out of the lightness of her mind returned from fear to fear her former insolence, denying to deliver up any one, and that she might confirm her words with as much fierceness in action, rendeth forces prettily to besiege

Ifæa. Whereupon the Romans thought fit to make no more delay, but sent both the Consuls thither with land and sea forces; the Consuls were L. Pothumius, A.F. A. N. Albinius, and Cn. Fulvius Cn. F. Cn. N. Centumalus. Cn. Fulvius had the command of the Navy consist-ling of two hundred ships; L. Pothumius was General of the Legions. Then again Teuta, being terrified, sent Demetrius Pharon to the Consuls to crave Peace. And they agreed upon a Truce, In case the Illyrians would quit Corcyra which they had lately possessed. The Romans being gone to take in Corcyra, Teuta, as if all fear were now far from her doors, returned to her former councils, and sent Deputies to besiege Dyrrachium and Apollonia. Others report, That Corcyra was not surrendered to the Consent of Teuta, but by the private design of Demetrius, who, knowing that he was secretly accused of some crimes before Teuta, thought by betraying that place he was Governor of, to find a sure refuge and pretension amongst the Romans to gain her fury.

The Illyrian Garrison was no sooner surrendered, but the Corcyrians by publick consent submitted themselves to the Romans, feeing no other means left for their safety, but to be protected against the inquiet of the Illyrians by the power of so illustrious a City. From Corcyra the Consul failed to Apollonia, where he met L. Pothumius having wafted over his Army from Brundajium, which consisteth of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. The Apoliottians greedily entertained the Romans, and committed their Faith. This being relieved they went to Dyrrachium, which prettily became the Romans: The Illyrians who had begun the siege thereof, running away for fear upon the first intelligence of the Con-sol's coming. With the same half also the Ardyaxi were forced into subjection, and Embassa-dors came from divers Nations of the farthest Illyrians with promise, To obey their commands

if they might be admitted into Friendship; in which number were the Parthi and Antinates, Demetrius Pharon was a great help and furtherance in these Achievements, for being carried up and down with the Consuls, he extolled the Strength and Integrity of the Romans, accused the Rahlues and Inconstancy of Teuta; and some by reason and counsel, others by his authority he persuaded into a Society and confederacy with the Romans. After this they cleared their course to Ifæa, and in theirpaffage landing at many places, they took most Towns with out any great difficulty. Nutria was stoutly defended by the Illyrians, and cost much blood before it was taken, some Collonels also and a Quelfor being slain there. The Romans grieved for this was the lessor because they surprised twenty Vessels coming from Peloponnesus with money and great spoil. When they were come to Ifæa it happened as it had done at Dyrrachium:

the siege was prettily raised upon the approach of the Roman Navy: The Barbarians flying this way and that way into several places, except only the Tharian, who for Demetrius sake, with the safety both of body and goods, were received into protection, forasmuch as he was born in the same land, and had the Government of it under King Agron. The news of these did diversely affect the infulable mind of Teuta, sometimes dejected with fear, sometimes again very confident, as the considered the occasion. For as she was pleased with fear when she remembered so many Towns taken and demolished, that the sea coasts were plunder'd and walled, that the Illyrians every where turned back and fled: On the other side she was encouraged at the loucnes of the Nutrines, and her hopes encreased considering Winter drew nigh, and that the Romans for fear of storms would suddenly depart; wherefore with a small

Retinue she retirèd to Rhizon intuate upon a River of the same name, expecting what remedy she would afford.

Her vain opinion was confirmed by the actions of the Consuls, who having committed to the Government of Demetrius the greater part of the Country they had taken, retirèd to Dyrrachium with the Navy and Army. But when the saw that L. Pothumius stayed behind with forty ships, and leaved an Army out of the Neighbour Cities to protect the Ardyaxi.

and other Illyrians who had revolted to the Romans, then Tenta began utterly to despair and thought of buying her peace upon any conditions whatsoever. At the beginning of the spring therefore the sent Embassadors to Rome, excusing what was past as being done by the Command of Agron whose Acts it was necessary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of administering affairs, neither had deferred any favour at their hands, but to Pinnaeus the son of Agron, on these conditions, That he should duly pay what tribute was imposed on him, that he should quit all Illyrium, some few places excepted, that he should not sail beyond Liffus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Coreya, Phars. Ilba, Dyrrachium and the Afintanes became wholly the Romans; what else was under Agron his jurisdiction being left to Pinnaeus. Tenta either for shame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Deurtricius undertook under the name of Protector.

Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended even to Greece, the Commonwealth on the other hand was perplexed, for the Gauls were ready to rife up in Arms, and the Carthaginians power did mightily encrease in Spain, which could not be established without great danger to the Romans, Hafdrubal the Son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar, having revenged the death of his Father-in-law, did, partly by Arms, but more frequently by his Wisdom and Eloquence, wherein he excelled, reduce many Nations to the Carthagian subjection; and built another Carthage called the New, in a gulf of the sea by a most commodious Haven. But the Gallick affairs being of nearer concernment, hindered for the present their designes against the Carthaginians: They endeavoured therefore to fip the proceedings of the Gauls by leagues and Covenants; They sent likewise Embassadors to Carthage and to Hafdrubal, warning them, To contain themselves beyond the River Iberus, and permit the Saguntines to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own Laws. These things happened in the year when Sp. Carolini Sp. F. Cn. N. Maximus and Q. Fabius Q. N. Maximus Verrucos were again Consuls. About the same time L. Publ. Proconful, who wittered in Illyrion, sent Embassadors from Coreya to the Eotolians and Achazians, declaring what he had done, For what causes the war was undertaken, with what success managed, and upon what conditions finished. They were kindly entertained forasmuch as those Nations and all other the Grecians did vehemently hate the Illyrians by reason of the continual Pyracies exercised by them under Agron and Tenta.

The Senate hearing this, did allow of what the Proconful had done, and moreover decreed another Embassador in the name of the Commonwealth, to the Corinthians and Athenians declaring, The people of Rome good affections toward them, and their equity toward all men. For the Romans purchased great good will amongst those people, and the Corinthians forthwith decreed this honour to the people of Rome, granting them the Patrons in the Ithamian Games, which was one of the former ancient solemnities in Greece. They were chiefly moved hereunto because the Romans had set at liberty, as Apollonia and other Grecian Cities, so Coreya likewise, which was a Colonie of the Corinthians; the Athenians also embraced the Roman Society, and decreed, They should have the liberty of the City of Athens, and of the Eleusinian Mysteries. In the mean time Cn. Fulvius Proconful made a Naval Triumph over the Illyrians on the Calends of Quinuvaltis, and beheaded the Illyrian Nobles whom he led in Triumph. This was the first Triumph over the Illyrians.

The next year P. Valerius L. F. M. N. Falceus, and M. Asilliis M. F. M. N. Regulus being Consuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might send some with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongst these M. Valerius was Pretor of Sardinia and Coreia, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for twas reported that the Boians and Infubrians confounded not only one with the other, but with the Tranlapine people, and had hired a great strength of Mercenaries of the Gauls a people of Gallia. They used therefore not only ordinary remedies against this evil, but such as a severe judge would by no means excuse, but that the love of one Country makes some things pardonable in themselves are horrid. For when besides other prodigies they were terrified with them, they found in the Sybills books, That the Gauls and Grecians should one day possess the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Priests, they buried alive two Gauls, of each sex one, and likewise two Grecians a man and a woman, in the Beef-marketer, that so they poffessing part of the City, might seem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M. F. M. N. Masilla and L. Asilliis L. F. C. N. Fulvus were Consuls. This year, amongst other no considerable occurrences, was most of it spent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raised a most incredible number both of horse and foot, toward this war all Italy in generaloying with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Hiforian, who was preemt at the transference of these affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thousand men. That the number of the Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thousand and two hundred footmen, and six and twenty thousand and six hundred horsemen. All the other multitude were Italians. The Veneti alfo and Cenomanni afforded the Romans the help of twenty thousand men, who by frequent alarms and incursions might compell the neighbourings Boians to tarry to the defense of their own Countrey, and not join themselves with the other forces of the the Enemy, because they refused to hearken to Terme's Peace which the Romans proposed.

For the Veneti and Cenomani being persuaded to renew friendship with Rome, the Insubrians strab.b.s and Boians persisted in Holitiy; nevertheless their strength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men; but being forced to leave some at home to defend their Countrys, with the rest (to wit, fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome.

In the mean time L. Atilius, Q. F. Cn. N. Papus, & C. Atius M. F. M. N. had Sar-dinia and Ariminum, with the adjoining Gaules for their Provinces. For the Sardiniens being aggrieved at the perpetual presence of a Praetor, with his Virges and Signes of Authority, did again move Tumults, but C. Atius the Consull soon quieted them without any great difficulty. L. Atilius had more to do with the Gaules, having broken through Etruria, and marching to Rome. The Praetour of Etruria being not able to hinder their passage, overtook them at Clusium, and late in the Evening planted his Camp not farre from them. The Gaules invented a stratagem whereby to entice the Romans out to battell. In the dead of the night they marched with all their Foot to Fesula, leaving the Horse behind with instruction, at break of day only to shew themselves to the Enemy, and presently betake themselves to the Foot Army, where should be reception for them in a convenient Camp, from whence likewise they would on the sudden charge the Romans unawares.

The Romans were hereby deceived, and purfied the horse as if they had fled, and about Fesula were received by the Enemy, fresh and ready prepared, being themselves weary and void of Counsell, as in an occurence not foreseen by them: Their only course was either by flight to defend themselves, or to fell their bloods at a dear rate: But the Gaules exceeding in number, besides other advantages, slew of the Romans six thousand upon the place, and put the rest to flight. The Gaules endeavouring to take a fenced place upon an hill, (whether the greater part of them which fled had betaken themselves) finding their strength to fail with their last nights march, the daysy fight, retired to cure and refresh their bodies, leaving a party of horse to besiege the hill, not doubting to reduce it into their power the next day, either by force or composition. In this very nick of time came L. Atilus, rather to be wished for, then upon any reasonable ground expected. For upon the first news of the Gaules setting forward, he was sent to Arimi-num, to defend the Coasts upon the Adriatick shore, but hearing their intention was to march to Rome, he marched by very many journeys from Ariminum, and by good luck came to this very place, and pitched his Camp not farre distant from the Enemy. The Belied seeing fires in the night time from that part, judging, as was true, that the Roman Army was sent out some of their men unarmed, that they might the easier pass the Enemies Guards. The Consull by them understanding the state of Affairs, without any long deliberation, which the time would not permit, at break of day set forward with his horse to the Hilllock, giving order to the Tri-bunes to follow him with the Legions. The Gaules likewise were surprised by the same fires, that the Romans were come, and entered into counsell concerning the present affairs. King Antroclus advised, that they should not encounter the Enemy, now their soldiers were laden with rich spoils, but to return home, and lay aside their plunder, and then, if occasion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the counsell, they departed before morning, taking their journey through Etruria, by the sea side. L. Atilius having taken in whole who fled to the hill, and having intelligence of the Enemies march, would not fight him in a fet battell, but resolved to follow them, laying hold of what opportunity time should afford.

In this conjuncture of Affairs fortune once more dispensed an unexpefted accident. The other Consull C. Atius arriving at Pisa from Sardinia, and there landing his Army, marched toward Rome along the very famous Etrurian shore where the Gaules were returning. Near Telamom a Port of Etruria, the Scouts of each Army first met one the other, and the Consull by some Prisoners who were brought to him, understanding of the Gaules march, and his Col-leagues following them wondered at so un-usual a chance, and being confident of Victory, having the Enemy couped between two Confular Armies, gave order to the Colonels, to array the Army as well as the ground would permit, and lead their Regiments in a figure body, and a flow march. Himself observing a piece of high ground, opportunely overlooking the way the Gaules must of necessity pass, set forward with a Party of horse to prepossess it. For he made what haste he could to fight the Enemy, being assured, if he were any thing worsted, to be relieved by his Colleague, if his undertaking succeeded, to carry away the chief glory of the Victory. The Gaules seeing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horse, went round about in the night time by Atilius, went out likewise some of their own horse, with the allusion of some light armed men, to open the passage. But being informed that the other Consull was come, he was forced to array and marshall his foot, with their faces each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joyned one to the other: For they saw C. Atius before them, and well knew that L. Atilus followed them behind. Against L. Atilus they placed the Transalpine Mercenaries, in the front (who from their weapons are denominated Sjatia) behind they, for a refuge were the Insubrians. Against Atius were opposed the Taufians and Boians. The Wagons and Carriages were placed as a ramshackle about each Wing: all their plunder, with a sufficient guard, was laid aside upon a neighbouring hill.
The fight was now begun at that hill which C. Attilius had posseted, whereby L. Aemilius conjectured that his Colleague was there, of whose journey he knew nothing certain, only he heard that he was arrived at Pise. Taking Counsel therefore on a sudden he commanded some of his own horse to ride to the place of fight. There the horse on both sides had a very hot encounter wherein C. Attilius the Conful was slain, and his head carried to the Gallick Kings: At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulsed the enemy. The Horie-fight being thus managed the Foot charged each the other. There was to be seen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & strength of both parties, so for the strange ordering of the Battel; for the Gauls being included between twoRoman Armies turned their faces on each side to battle; it being very doubtful whether this posture were a greater advantage to them, in that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear secure, and were of necessity compelled to stand to it having no way to flee; or that it were a greater disadvantage to be hemmed in by two Confular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aspect of the men who stood in the front, with fierce countenances and valt bodies; partly encouraged not only with the sweetneffe of praise, but of plunder also, for among the former ranks of the Gaules there was not a man, but glistered with golden bracelets and arm ferrings.

The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great slaughter of the Enemy, especially where the Gaetae stood, who in a barbarous orientation had hung away their garments and fought naked in the front. For the Gallick shields being long and narrow not able to cover the whole body, they stood like so many spears exposed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to strike the enemy, not to come to pel-mel with light armed men. Wherefore growing desperate some running rafhly upon the enemy were killed with darts before they could come to handy-fights; others by degrees retiring backward disordered their own Battel. The Gaete being thus vanquished by the light-armed men, the compleat-armed did on every side charge the Boians, Infubrians, and Taureians and flew a great number; nevertheless the enemy fight with resolute minds, being in nothing inferior but in their weapons; for neither did their shields defend their bodies, neither did their swords much offend the Romans, for being made only to hack and how they had no good points; they were likewise made crooked at the first blow, and unlike for a second, unless they be straightned againe by your foot on the ground. The Romans having already the better, were affured of the victory by the returne of the horfe, who, having put the Gallick horse to flight, riding down the hill made an impression upon the flank of the enemy, so much the more irresistible coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polibius dibiereth the Battel of the Gaules in Erruria; from whome others with little reason do differ. For who can easily believe, that the Gaules were compelled by a tempt to fly in the night time fearing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Attilius letting upon their Rear were at a distance from them? that afterward, each party for some dayes kept within their defences. C. Attilius fought happily with them? neither are they any more to be credited, who relate the Battel as fought, not on the sea Coasts, but, in the Aretine Territories. There is no question made but that forty thousand Gauls were then slain, little leffe then ten thousand taken, with Concalius one of their Kings: the other King Ancreatus who was of greater reputation for power and courage, escaping with a small company, in his flight cut the throats of all his Kindred and his own also. There was great plunder found, whic the Conful causeth to be reserved to those from whom it was at first taken, every mantoowning his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Attilius, through Liguria into the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his soldiars as a reward of their pains taken, and they in a few dayes being sufficiently laden with spoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater joy of all, because the war was formidable. Scarce any mans Triumph was ever so much celebrated with acclamations of the people; being otherwise of it self very gallant and memorable as for the glory of his noble performances, so for the number of the Captives and the worth of the spoils. There were many military Ensignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongst the Gauls. But all mens eyes were chiefly intended upon Britomartus and the other Gallick Princes, whom Attilius by way of scoff led girt and armed into the Capitol, as if thereby he tooke care they should fulfill the vow they had made, Never to unloose their girdles or Belts, till they had ascended the Capitol. L. Aemilius made this Triumph over the Gaules on the third of the None of March. This year was made the one and fortieth Lustration by the Cenforis, Q. Claudius Ap. F. C. N. Cenfus and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the desire of revenge remained, and both the next year Confuls had Gallia for their Province; the Confuls were T. Manlius T. F. N. Torquatus and Q. Fulvius M. F. D. N. Flaccus again. The people chearfully decreed them Armies and whatsoever accommodation belonged to the Commencing or prosecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after so great a victory, they might easily drive away the Gauls from about the Po if they minded their busines. The Confuls being gone with their Armies presently terrified the Boians into submission, their expedition afterwards was not so quick by reason of the Pellifience and so many thours which fell. Others affirm, That these Confuls crossed the Po, and in a fast battel overcame the Infubrians, that they slew three and twenty thousand and took five thousand. But I rather follow the authority of Polibius in these affairs.
In the mean time because the Consuls being in a far Country, and were hindered either by action, or by showers, so that they could not return to the general Assembly: Lucullus L. F. C.N. M. Fabius M. F. N. Brutus, by the Assembly, and Flamininus C. F. N. and P. Furius S. F. M. N. Philus were made Consuls. These as I think were the first Romans, who making an invasion into the Infubrians Country, crossed the Po with their Army, where the River Padua fell, into the Po.

This boldness cost them much labour and some blood; for in their paffes over the River, and while they pitched their Camps, the enemy fiercely falling in upon them slew a considerable number. The Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily encreased by many Prodigies related, as that in the Picenian Territories, a River ran blood, that in Tauria the skin was seen to burn, that at Ariminum in the night time light appeared, and three Moons were seen at the same time, also a Vulture was said to find many days together in the Forum at Rome. For though about the same time Caria was shaken with an Earthquake, and the Rhodian Colossus fell down, these things were not thought to concern the Romans at all: Concerning the other Prodigies the Augurs being asked their advice, answered that the Consuls were not visibly chosen, whereupon letters were sent after them to recall them back to the City. In the mean time the Consuls having made a Truce, had quitted the Infubrians Country, and afterward having raised ranked Auxiliaries in the Country of the Cenomani, had again began to infest the grounds lying under the Alps, whereupon the Infubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden enigmas (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called Immoveable, because it was not lawful to stir them but in the time of Extrem Necessity; and had now met the Romans with an Army of fifty thousand men, ready to enter battle. At this very time came the letters from the Senate, C. Flamininus either guelling at the subsistance of the letters, or being pre-informed by his friends, perfwaded his Colleague, not to open them before battle.

Being resolved to fight, they confulted about their Mercenary Gaules, lest if they were neglectful, they might have cause to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occasion of using harm. For they feared their incivility, especially fighting against Neighbours and Kindred. At last they thought fit to place them on the other side of the River, where the bridge being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to fly, but to trull in their courage. After a sharp dispute the Romans obtained the Victory, to the greater praise of the Tribunes than the Consuls. For C. Flamininus had ordered the Battel near the brink of the River, that there was no space left to receive the Troupes in case they had been forced to retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribunes having had experience by former battles, that all the Gallic Valour consisteth in the first charge, which is very long but short, and if the brunt of it be once borne, there is more to be feared from them; did divide the spears or the Truppions among the first ranks, that with them they might receive the first onfer, and afterward flinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallic Swords were prettily blunt, and made crooked at the first stroke upon the spears, and while they were busy in making them straight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Rapiers, took from them the use of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallic Swords, that being made only to hack, some time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the strokes which if it be denied, they are of no use: But the Romans thrilling with the point could do their business in a moment, and so prefiling forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did securely thrull them into the face and breasts.

It is reported that nine thousand Gaules were slain, and double the number taken. After the Victory, they spoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they thought fit to read the Senators letters, the contents whereof Philipus was ready to obey: But C. Flamininus insisted, that this was the duty of some Senators, and not the office of the Prefiaces; whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he said also he would not return till either the War was finished, or his Magistracy expired: adding moreover, that he would cause the Romans to leave off the foolish observation of Anguries, and his other superstitions. Nevertheless P. Furius perilling in his resolution, the Army of Flamininus, fearing that after his departure they should not be so safe in the enemies Country, perforce did him to carry for some few days; but he did utterly abstain from all actions, Flamininus taking in the mean time some Gaules, as also a City of no small renown among those people. The spoiles he gave to his friends, to prepare their minds for his defence in that quarrel he knew would arise between him and the Senate. This City indeed was so moved with indignation, that none went out according to the cullome to meet the Consuls, and not only Flamininus but for his fake Philipus also was denied the honour of Triumph. At length Flamininus by the peoples favour entred the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many rich spoiles were to be seen in that Triumph: Great store of Arms, and chains of Gold out of which Flamininus dedicated a Token of Victory to Jupiter in the Capitolium, inverting the Gallic Vow, who had promised out of the Romans spoiles to dedicate a Chain to Mars. Afterward the other Consul triumphed over the Gauls, and the Figurians on the fourth of the Ides of March. The Senators ill being hereby rather intended then overcome, did not not cease till they were both forced to disdain this their second Triumph: about the same time, by the like severity, two very eminent persons were deprived of their Priesthood, M. Corneius Cæcrops, because he had not aught laid open the Entrails, and Q. Sulpicius, because in the time of sacrifice his cap fell from his head. When thefe Confuls time was out, the Assembly was held by an Interrex, where M. Claudius M. F. M. N. M. Aurelius being made Confusl, was assumed for his Colleague C. Cornelius, L. F. L. N. Scipio Calvis. These Confusl denied Peace to the Infubrians though they petitioned for it, M. Marcellus chiefly refusing all Conditions, out of his desire to Triumph. And the Gauls themselves seemed to meditate war rather than Peace, for having a new hired thirty thousand Gæatae, and overcome the Alps, they had gathered together a far greater number of Infubrians.

The war being thus begun, the Confusl set out in the beginning of the spring, and besieged Acerræ, between Po and the Alps. It seeming difficult to drive the Romans from the siege, Britomartus with ten thousand Gæatae, resolved to go forth, and wafe the Regions about Po, which the Confusl understanding, so divided their forces. That Cn. Cornelius might with part of the Army prosecute the siege, while Marcellus with two thirds of the Horæ, and a choice company of light armed men, went about to succour and defend their Affociates. Having chosen the lightest and nimblest, not above fix hundred, with these and his Horæ he marched day and night toward the Enemy, whom having overtaken at Clastidium, he presently encountered before he could refresh his men, not of his own good will, but forced by the fury of the Gæatae, who being superior in number, and arrogating to themselves the mastery in horsemanship, hearing the Confusl had brought but few foot along with them, left off their siege of Clastidium, and forthwith purr'd on to crush Mr. Marcellus, having drawn out his battall at length, that he might not be encompassed by the multitude of his Enemies, marched forward to meet them. Their bodies were now not far at hand, when the Confusl intending to begin the Charge, his Horæ affrighted with the clamour and thots of the Gauls, flarted aside and carried him back. The Confusl fearing lest this accident being esteemed an ill Omen, should daunt the courage of his men, as his horse wheeled about he adored the Sun, as if he had turned about his Horæ for the same purpose; according to the antient custom, men using to turn themselves about when they worshipp'd the Gods. 'Tis reported, that before the first onset, he vowed to Jupiter Feretrix the fairest of the Enemies Armes; And presently spying Britomartus in the head of his Troops, his armour glittering with Gold and Silver, and other colours, he judged the to be the Armes which he had vowed. The King also, having seen the Roman Generall, advanced far before his men, and by voice and girture challenged him to Combat, M. Marcellus accepted, and immediately having run him through the breast-plate, wounded him with the speare, and with the force of his Horæ Carrying tumbling him to the ground, reiterating his Stroke, he drew him in the place, whereupon leaping off his horse, and holding the armes in his hands, he lift up his eyes to heaven, saying, Jupiter Feretrix, who beholdst the deeds of Valiant Commanders in battall! Behold, I the third Roman, as thy holy craft Wiltur. a General having slain a General of the Enemies, doe confracthe the Royall spoils unto thee: Doe then suffer our affairs prosperously to succeed even to the flush of the Wars. Marcellus taking horse again, they entered battall with all might and main, the Romans fighting most courageously; the Confusl's boldness and good Fortune having filled them with les noth with Valour for the Encounter, then with hopes of Victory. Wherefore neither the Gallic nor yet the Foot which came to their reliefe could endure the bruit: So that a few men, which is rarely seen, carried away the Victory from a numeros Army. The spoiles being gathered up, the Confusl returned to his Colleague, who having taken Acerræ where he found great store of Corne, being now about Mediolanum, had much ado to defend himselfe from the Enemy, for while he was busie in the siege of their strongest and mott populous City, the Metropolis of Infubria, they had as it were round besieged him with great multitudes: But Marcellus his approach quickly altered the Scene. For the Gæatae being informed of their Kings death, went away, and Mediolanum being by them forsaken, was not able to defend itselfe. So that many of the Infubrian forces being thain, Mediolanum, and after that Comum taken, the other Cities together with the whole Nation submitted themselves to the Romans, being fined in a summe of money, and part of their grounds, having otherwise good Conditions of Peace. M. Marcellus being returned home, made a most illustrious triumph over the Infubrian Gauls, and the Germans on the Calends of March. This is the first mention of the Germans in the Roman History, who being hired, came from the Nations beyond the Rhine, under the conduct of Fridrimrn their General, Thes and the Gallic Captives, men of vaft stature of body, with other rich spoiles were led before the Triumphant Charaitor. The Confusl followed, with the rarest spectacles, carrying the armes of the flain General to Jupiter Feretrix; after him marched his loudiers harnesed with glittering Armes, making thouts, and Military Acclamations. In this order being come to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrix, M. Marcellus descending from his Chariot; dedicated his Royall spoils to Jupiter, being the third after Romanus and M. Corneius Cæcrops, who had done so, and after him no man ever did the like. The people of Rome beheld these Armes with the greater pleasure, in that the Enemies were said to have vowed the Roman Armes to Vulcan. So great was the Joy of this Victory, that the Romans out of the spoiles, sent a Golden Cup to Apollo of Delphi, and of the Gallic Armes to their Aflociate Cities round about.
Demetrius observing what was done, took as good Counsel as in such a dangerous case could be; for declining the present skirmish, and calling his foilliers together, and that men, faith he, it appeared that our courage is formidable to the enemy; for, betaking themselves to stratagems, they declare little trust in their force of arms. They have made use of the night season to creep into this island, of which, if I be not deceived in you, they shall profess more, then what they can cover with their bodies having payed for it with their lives. Only you, my Country-men of Phocas, and young men of Illyricum, be mindful of your Country, of your honour, and make the Roman's know, 'twas neither their valor nor our cowardice, which gave them occasion once to Triumph at Rome over the Illyrians. It was not Polybius or PUBLIUS with all their Counsel and strength, but Teuta which conquered Illyrians by her raffiness and impotence of affections. And, to omit other things, ye are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been so easy, but that Teuta chose to have me rather her enemy then her Protector. But because I firmly trust to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I shall say no more. Ye have courage, ye have weapons, ye see the necessity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your selves, and your Citee unless by your valor ye repel it. Let us on then and with happy fortune charge those men who are newly crept out of their hiding places: We shall do well enough with those who are landing; if we once overtake them, the others will fly to their ships; in greater haste then now they leave them.

Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge those who were poofided of the Hill, and they as diligently ordering themselves sustained his charge, till they, who in the mean time had landed, coming upon his Reare utterly routed his whole body with great slaughter. Some few by flight escaped to the Town, others by blind paths flipp'd away. Demetrius who in certain by-places had botches ready prepared for all adventures getting aboard one of them fled to Philip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by flattery, and Tyranneous advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and likewise was author unto him of the Roman War and many other Calamities. After this fight Phocas was taken, and by the Conful's Command plunder'd and demolished. The Illyrian affairs being afterward settled to his own liking, the Conful now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtain his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewise chos'n to follow Polybius, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finishing this War to both the Confuls, who having summoned Demetrius to appear before them, did, upon default, War with him in the Hand of Asa by the same act as I have related, and then taking Phocas by Treachery removed him out of the Dominions. Concerning whole end likewise they differ from Polybius, who lived nearer those times and those places; but these things as being after this time I shall pass by. But the Romans, for King Philip his fake, whose wars declair'd him innocent of these deblignes, did spare the Illyrians, and renewed the league with him, with addition of some Articles. L. Aemilius made a new glorious Triumph over these people, and I find also that M. Licinius Triumphed for this War, but most writers mention it not; 'tis likely, because the performances of L. Paulus, being the more eminent, did obscure the glory of his Colleague.

More notable a while after was the judgment and condemnation of the same M. Livius. He and L. Paulus being out of Envy accused, That they had not equally distributed the spoils among the foilliers, but had converted many things to other uses, did undergo the sentence of the people. L. Paulus hardly escaped. M. Livius was condemned by all the Tribes except only the Octavian. Whilh disgrace and indignity he took so heavly, that departing the Citee, he avoided all meetings, till the Commonwealth's occasions recalled him to his former course of life. But these things happened in the Consulship of T. Cornelian Sefius and T. Sempronius Longus. But in the same year when M. Livius and Paulus were Consuls, one Archagathus the son of Lysanias came out of Persia to Rome, who professing Phrygic was made free of the Citee, endowed with all the privileges of a Roman, and had a shop bought for him at the Publick charge in the Acilian Street. A thing not so much worthy taking notice of, but that then first was the name of the Medicall faculty heard of and known at Rome; they having to this time preferred their healths by temperance and remedies not bought. In the same Consul's time Colonies were dedicated to Plocenia and Cremona in the Gallick Territories, Being none of the least causes of anger which moved the Boians and Infubrians to incline to Hannibal, who, now assaflaining Saguntum with all might, did by the ruines thereof prepare his way to the Roman Wars. But these and other commotions, which in great number, without no leffe Terroour and violence preffently assifled the Romans, will the better be understood by relating foregoing Circumstances.

about. To Htaro King of Syracuse, besides some of the spoiles, they sent the price of that Corn he had accommodated them with during the Gallic War. After this a new enemy arose, the Iphians who infellow the Seas with Piracy, and had taken some of the Roman Corn ships. Against these both the Confuls were sent, P. Cornelius, and M. Minucius Rufus, who brought into subjection many people either by force or composition. Nevertheless I do not find that these Conuls Triumphed; perhaps because their Victory cost so much Roman blood. This year arofe a Starre in Spain destructive to many Cities and Nations; to wit, Hannibal the successor of Hysrual, of whose beginnings and proceedings ye shall shortly read more from a greater Pen.

In the mean time the new Conuls, L. Veturius, and C. Lentulus marched to the Alps with their Army, but making more use of Treaties then Armes, they joyned many of those people with their own good liking to the Roman Society. At this time the Illryian War was renew'd, by Demetrius Pharus his fault, against whom many complaints were made, in as much as under presence of the Roman friendship, he had vexed and afflicted the neighbour Cities according to his pleasure. For being by the Romans invelled with the Tribunal of K. Pinna whose mother Tribute he had married, he behaved himselfe like a King, and grew very high and intolerable both to the people of the Countrie, and to Neighbouring Regions. He endeavoured likewise to bring under his own dominion the people of Ilyricum, the Friends and associates of the Romans, and moreover contrary to the league, he fled beyond Illyria with fifty Armed Vessels, to the Islands Cicladis, some of them he plundered, from others he extorted money, and had now drawn into his party, as many Illyrians as since the late War bore a grudge to the Romans, and forced the Assiduniae his side. Neither did he any whit fear the Romans, who being involved in a Gallic War, and fearing a Phrygian one, he thought had neither strength nor Liefure enough to revenge the Injuries of his associates. He promised himself any favour from Philip King of Macedon, whom he had afflicted in the Clieomanen War, being General of the Illyrick Auxiliaries: A War was therefore decreed against him, and preparations made. In the mean time L. Atimilus and C. Flaminius being Confers made the three and fourtienth Laturition, there were numbered two hundred and seventye thousand, two hundred and thirty Citizens. A promisitc multitude of Liberties being dispersd amongst the Tribes, had hitherto made great confusion; in imitation therefore of L. Fabius Maximus, the Confers reduced them into four Tribes, the Estutions, Palatine, Suburanne, and the Collins. C. Flaminius in the same Consurface hanged in the high way to Ariminum, and built a temple place, both called by his name; The Flamianew shew place, and the Flamianin way. The same Confers committed Marius, of the Dyers trade, to the judgement of the people; not thinking it to be beneath the dignity of so high a Magistracy to enquire into pett things. About the same time the Illrion rebellion caitled the Senate to give the charge of that province to M. Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator, and M. Atimilus, M. F. Paulus the Conuls. Demetrius on the other side, was not slack in preparing himselfe for the War, having sent a strong Garrison to Dalmatia, and providing all necessaries for the fulling of a long siege. In some places he gave order for the slaughter of the prime men, whose fidelity he mistrusted, and committed the Government to his own creatures. Out of the whole Kingdom he gathered a choice strength of six thoufeand men, whom he kept with himselfe in Garrison at Pharos.

In the mean time L. Paulus the Conul leeting forth in the beginning of the spring, failed over into Illyricum, and underdstanding that the enemy put great hopes in the strengt of Damaltia, which they thought impregnable, he rightly judged that it would strike much terror into them, in case he should make himselfe Mafter of it: Assaulting it therefore with very much courage and cheerfulnes, he took it by storm in twenty days time. Neither was the Conul deceived in his project, for the news hereof being spread into the neighbour Regions, meffengers came flocking from every City, offering up themselves, and all their goods into the hands of the Romans. The Conul having received them into protection, failed to the Land of Pharos, where Demetrius kept his Court. But understanding that it was well manned with a Garrison of Souldiers, furnished with provision of all forts; strong, both by citation, and also with artificial works, and guarded with the presence of the Tyrant himself; the Conul unwilling to begin a tedious siege, contrived a flaragmen of great use to the speedy effecting of Victory.

For fending over the greater part of his Army in the night time, with order to cover themselves in woody Tracts; Himself app ears in open day with twenty ships making towards the Haven, whereby he drew out the Pharians, among whom was Demetrius himself, to hinder his landing. Upon the first engagement it hapned, as is usual, that many more by degrees running to the succour of their friends, the City was left almost naked of Souldiers. In the mean time thofe Romans who had landed in the night time, taking their journey through covert places, posseted an hill even in the midt between the City and the Haven, thereby rendring it imposible for thofe who were come out of the Town to return safe back.
